He was at once put under arrest.

The safe in the Northern Pacific railway station at Clitherall, Minn., on the Black Hills branch, was robbed of $750, $600 of which belonged to the Northern Pacific Elevator company. The thief is supposed to be a young man named Nichols, about twenty-two years of age, who was formerly a station agent at Cromwell, Minn. His left arm is off about the elbow. He came to Clitheran to visit, and the regular agent got him to supply while he went away on some business.

At Ogden, Utah, John Kelly has been sentenced to life imprisonment for a murder committed twenty-six years ago. Early in 1865 Kelly was one of a sheriff's posse who ran down a bold horse-thief named Dart, who was shot dead for resisting arrest. The other members of the posse are dead or have left the country.

Robert Carr was taken out of the city calaboose at Nevada, Mo., by four masked men and carried to the outskirts of the town, where he was most outrageously whipped with hickory withes, over one hundred blows being laid across his naked back and shoulders. When released he was covered with blood, and innumerable welts showed the severity of his punishment. Carr was incarcerated for wife-beating, and the vigilantes said they whipped him for this, and also for being a Pinkerton detective and correspondent of a Kansas City paper.

At Seattle officers seized a valise containing a quantity of valuable silks and embroideries, which was claimed by a woman giving the name of Mrs. Abdenour, and who said the goods came from New York, where the duty had been paid, and that she and her husband had a store in New York and had intended to open one in Tacoma, but that her husband's sickness prevented their doing so. She claimed to be a missionary, and said that she had visited Mrs. President Harrison at Washington for three weeks last summer. The officers think the goods were smuggled.

A clever capture of a mail robber was made at Cheyenne Col., by Henry Ford, a mail transfer clerk. Ford was entering the postoffice to take out the early morning mails, when he discovered a man at the mailing case opening letters. Ford withdrew without being seen, and secured assistance. Hagley, alias Pen C. Line, of Denver. He had worked as a waiter in the hotel adjoining the postoffice. He had secured considerable booty when interrupted.

The price per thousand to be paid is said to have been agreed upon, and the deal will be consummated as soon as the estimates on the amount of stumpage are accepted. The deal will involve about $1,000,000.

Albuminous Food.

Prof. Sanborn makes some good points in the following article on feeding stock for market: "One of the best illustrations of the subtle influence of diet on the structure of the animal is seen in the greater weights of the hides of the more albuminous lot. Hides are albuminous in character and this increase of the weight of hides is in harmony with the increased weight of hair found with the pigs under albuminous diet, and as well as anything can show it shows that we can make our cattle lean or fat with pleasure. But it is said that any one can make steers as lean as 'Job's turkey.' But I seek large ration of lean with rapid growth and a fine market steer with the maximum of lean, for our steers as now fitted for market carry a mass of layer-fat. The average buyer for consumption knows less what to do with it than with fat pork. A roast of fat stock show animal was about one-half thrown away at my table from excessive fat. I was concerned last year in the disposal of fat stock show animals at Kansas City and found that butchers were reluctant to handle the animals, saying that their customers did not like them on account of the waste fat." Butchers in this and other cities have the same reluctance to handle very fat animals, either cattle, sheep or hogs. There is too much waste in them, which the slightly higher prices realized does not offset.

Tobacco Decoction.

The use of tobacco smoke in closed rooms like forcing houses and conservatories is too well known to need remark. That a decoction is also very valuable is perhaps not so well known. For this purpose even the stems, or refuse powder which can be got very cheaply in tobacco factories, will answer well. Of this, bulletin 58 of the Michigan experimental station, says: A pound of the tobacco to two or three gallons of water makes a very effective decoction. Turn the boiling water onto the tobacco, and when cool strain out the tobacco, and the decoction is ready for use. Last summer this was found very effective against the striped flea beetle and the cucumber flea beetle, both of which insects are often very troublesome to the gardener. If further use confirms this property of the tobacco decoction we have in it a very valuable insecticide, and may hope by further experiment to greatly extend its use. It is, too, one of the best substances to use in the destruction of lice on cattle, horses, and for ticks on lambs. True, the kerosene emulsion will kill such lice, but it does not destroy the lice so entirely, and does not leave the hair or the animal looking so well. In cold weather, after thoroughly washing the animal to be treated, it should be warmly blanketed and kept in a warm place until dry. The work of washing an animal is not great. The writer has, unaided, washed a large cow in ten minutes, and did it well. Neither is it disagreeable.

AGAINST PARNELL.

Justin McCarthy to Prepare an Address to the Irish People.

Parnell Will Make a Personal Appeal to the Irish this Week.

London, Dec. 10.—In response to the call issued by Justin McCarthy, the leader of the anti-Parnellite section of the Irish party, all the members of the party who are opposed to Mr. Parnell assembled to-day to further consider the line of policy to be adopted. Copies of the call had been addressed to Mr. Parnell and his supporters, but it is hardly necessary to state that none of them were present. A council comprising eight members, Messrs. Abraham, Dillon, Healy, O'Brien, Arthur O'Connor, Thomas Power O'Connor, Sexton and Sheehy, was appointed to assist Mr. McCarthy in deciding the future action of the party. After the appointments of the council an adjournment was taken until to-morrow.

Before adjourning the meeting unanimously authorized Mr. McCarthy to prepare an address to the Irish people at home and abroad. In this he will give the present aspect of the Irish question and outline the future policy of his party.

Mr. Parnell will send a mission to the United States for the purpose of placing before the American people his side of the cotroversy that has arisen in the Nationalist party.

William O'Brien sent a cable dispatch to Mr. Parnell to-day appealing to him to suggest some way by which Ireland might be saved from destruction. Mr. Parnell replied: "It is now too late to rescue the seceders from their false position. I shall be glad to consult you on your arrival in Europe."

Mr. Parnell has sent a dispatch to Milwaukee declining an offer of $15,000 for 100 lectures.

VOTED TOGETHER.

Both Factions of the Nationalists United in Opposition to One Bill.

London, Dec. 10.—The anti-Parnellite members of the house of commons made an early appearance in the house to-day.

Mr. McCarthy gave notice that upon the reassembling of the house he would call attention to the circumstahces in connection with the recent arrest and prosecution of Messrs. Dillon and O'Brien and would move a resolution in relation to the case.

Mr. William Henry Smith, the government leader, announced that when the house went into committee on the land purchase bill he would move an adjournment of the house until Jan. 2.

Mr. Balfour moved the second reading of the land department (Ireland) bill.

Mr. Healy moved to adjourn the debate on the ground that the government was treating the house with contempt in not explaining the provisions of this bill. Subsequently Mr. Healy withdrew his motion to adjourn, and substituted an amendment calling for the rejection of the land department bill. This was defeated, and the bill passed its second reading.

Mr. Parnell entered the house just before the division. He took a seat next to Mr. McCarthy and voted, as did all the Irish members of both sections present, against the bill.

Mr. Balfour's Irish relief bill, which asks an appropriation of £5,000 to enable him to supply seed potatoes to distressed farmers, passed its third reading in the house.

A DELICATE SITUATION.

New York, Dec. 10.—The members of the Irish parliamentary party, Messrs. Dillon, O'Brien, Sullivan, Gill and O'Connor, were in consultation all the morning on the advisability of making another statement as to their position on the Parnell question. To a reporter Mr. O'Brien dictated the following:

"The situation is one of extreme delicacy, and may involve consequences affecting the whole course of Irish affairs during our generation. Under these circumstances we must ask our friends to believe that it is under a sense of deep responsibility we continue to maintain an attitude of complete reserve. Having still a strong hope that the Irish people may be spared the calamity of internal dissensions, and being persuaded that we will best aid in that direction by avoided all unnecessary publicity, we are all in complete accord as to our action, and we must beg the public to take no notice of ridiculous rumors to the contrary."

The party has no plans formed as yet as to their future movements.

William O'Brien has received the following cablegram to-day from the high sheriff and chairman of Cork: Influential committees in both the city and county are being formed to sustain the cause. Party fever is rapidly passing over and common sense is asserting itself. The city and county of Cork will do their whole duty.

PARNELL TO TAKE THE FIELD.

He Is Announced to Make Several Speeches in Ireland.

London, Dec. 10.—Mr. Parnell goes to Ireland to-morrow. He will deliver a political address in the Rotunda, Dublin, Wednesday, and in Leinster hall, Dublin, on Thursday, and afterward proceed to Cork, Longford, Granard, Limerick and Waterford.

The Healy Gaelic Athletic association has adopted a resolution requesting Mr. Healy to abandon his present position and support Mr. Parnell.

The Tipperary town commissioners have adopted a resolution declaring that they have lost confidence in Mr. Parnell.

A committee to further the maintenance of Mr. Parnell in the leadership of the Irish Nationalists is being formed in Dublin.

Moved Further Into the Bad Lands.

Pine Ridge, S. D., Dec. 10.—A scout came in to-night and reported that no sooner had the hostile chiefs returned home from the council held yesterday than they proceeded to move the camp several miles deeper into the Bad Lands, instead of counciling a move therefrom as advised by Gen. Brooke.

The Sisseton-Wahpeton Bill.

Washington, Special Telegram, Dec. 10.—Representative Pickler had a conference with Chairman Perkins, of the Indian committee, to-day and was informed that Wednesday would be given to the committee, and if the discussion upon the other bills did not consume too much time he would call up the Sisseton and Wahpeton bill, and it perhaps might be put through. The Indian committee having secured another day, it is probable that the bill for the Cœur d'Alene Indians will be considered. Representatives Sweet of Idaho and Wilson of Washington, who are most nearly interested in the bill, believe it will pass.

HOLDEN MUST HANG.

The Country's Highest Court Decides the Smith Law Constitutional.

Washington, Dec. 10.—Clifton Holden, the Redwood Falls murderer, must hang. The United States supreme court to-day affirmed the decision of the Minnesota court. By this decision the John Day Smith execution law is declared constitutional.

This case has attracted a good deal of attention by reason of its arising under a state statute forbidding newspapers to print accounts of hangings. Holden was convicted of a murder committed Nov. 23, 1888, and the governor commanded the sheriff to hang him conformably to the provisions of section 3 of an act passed in April 1889. This act, among other things, prescribed solitary confinement, limited the number of persons to be present at hangings, specially excluding reporters, and forbade newspapers to publish more than a mere statement that any person was hanged. Counsel contended that the provision for solitary confinement in Holden's case was ex post facto, and that, as there was no saving clause in the new law, he could not be held under the old law.

The court holds that this last point is not well taken for the reason that the statute repealed only inconsistent prior enactments, and was therefore good as to consistent enactments. Mere questions as to exclusion of persons, the court says, do not affect any substantial right of the convict. The limitations as to the number and character of those who might witness the execution, and the exclusion of newspaper men are regulations which the legislature, in its wisdom and for the public good, could legally prescribe. The only part of the law that may be deemed ex post facto is that prescribing solitary confinement, and there is no proof that Holden is so confined. The court cannot indulge the presumption that he is in solitary confinement. The governor's warrant does not require any such proceeding, for that is not among the provisions of section 3 of the act.

BOUGHT BONDS.

Secretary Windom's Efforts to Increase the Circulation.

Washington, Dec. 10.—The treasury department to-day purchased $3,891,000 4 per cent bonds under the terms of the circular issued Saturday last, at prices ranging from $1.22 to $1.23½. The department also purchased about 700,000 ounces of silver to-day.

The amount of 4 per cent bonds accepted to-day under the circular of Dec. 6, was $4,591,000, for which a disbursement of about $5,550,000 in money will be made. The secretary of the treasury said this afternoon that in view of all the conditions, he would accept additional offers of 4s at a reasonable price, of a sufficient amount to make the total purchases $8,000,000, for which he said the expenditures will be nearly $10,000,000.

The secretary said further that it was manifestly impossible under existing conditions for him to use the fractional currency now in the treasury in the purchase of bonds for the reason that it would at once be returned to him in exchange for greenbacks, and leave him with a deficiency instead of a surplus. There is now about $19,000,000 of fractional currency in the treasury, of which all but $2,000 is in silver half dollars. As it is legal tender to the amount of $10 only, it is not regarded as a part of the available cash balance. The secretary said he would like very much to get it into circulation, but that he certainly should not do so at the expense of his limited available surplus.

NO ROOM IN CHICAGO.

Western Association Magnates Look the Windy City Situation Over.

Chicago, Special Telegram, Dec. 10.—Sam Morton came to town to-day on a mysterious base ball mission. At about the same time President Hatch, of the Minneapolis club, and other officers of the Western association stepped off incoming trains. Before night they held a conference in Spalding's store. The object of the visit was to canvass the local situation with a view of placing a Western association team in Chicago. Their advisors agreed almost unanimously there was no opening for such an enterprise. Should another professional ball team play here next season it will represent the American association, whose managers are eager to place Chicago on their circuit and who have a prior claim on Spalding's acquiescence, without which, no other national agreement organization can be established here. The visit of President Thurman last week and his talk on the subject led to the belief that he will make no effort to divide the local base ball patronage next year, and the same reasons that may cause the American association to abandon the Chicago idea will be more than sufficient to subdue the Western association enthusiasts.

WILL ATTACK THE INDIANS.

Armed Ranchmen Take to the Warpath Near Rapid City.

Rapid City, S. D., Dec. 10.—A band of Indians from Little Wound's camp is camped about ten miles east of the Cheyenne river between the mouths of French and Battle creeks. They have been raiding deserted ranches, killing and running off stock, burning hay and grain and stealing household goods. To-day twenty armed men, well mounted, left Rapid City for the Indian camp. They will be joined by a number of ranchmen, and if they are not intercepted by the troops will attack the Indians.

A special from Custer says that not far from Buffalo Gap T. M. Warren, a ranchman, with four of his men attacked a raiding party of Indians and killed four. This story is not verified.

The Argentine Situation.

London, Dec. 10.—Dispatches from Buenos Ayres state that a feeling of disquiet reigns in the city and throughout the republic, and that fears are entertained of another outbreak. The public are disgusted with the financial situation and with the accumulating evidence of astounding frauds perpetrated under the former regime, and a party is gradually growing which advocates the repudiation of foreign indebtedness. The latest developed frauds are of the most overwhelming character and unparalleled in financial history. The provincial bank of Santa Fe was plundered of $7,000,000 by one man. It is reported that beneficiaries of plunder under the Celman regime are quietly leaving the country with the vast profits of their operations, and President Palligrini's government is blamed for not taking more active steps to bring the rascals to justice. The whole community seems to take a hopeless view of affairs, in striking contrast to the lavish and buoyant extravagance of former days.

A Sensational Libel Suit.

London, Dec. 10.—The trial is proceeding of G. W. Butterfield, an American company promoter, who is charged with libeling Harry Marks, the proprietor of the Financial News. Mr. Butterfield accused Mr. Marks of stealing jewelry and money from Mrs. Koppel, the widow of the proprietor of the New York Jewish Times, and of systematic swindling and blackmail. The defense seeks to justify the libels. Mrs. Koppel has deposed that Marks cohabited with her under a promise of marriage; that he controlled the paper after her husband's death, and that he took possession of her jewelry and money, deserting her after he had reduced her to a state of penury.

WORK OF CONGRESS.

Proceedings of Both Branches of the National Legislature.

Tuesday December 2.

SENATE.

Mr. Cullom introduced a bill to reduce letter portage to 1 cent.

Mr. Hawley, from the committee on military affairs, reported, and asked to have put upon its passage, a joint resolution authorizing the secretary of war to issue arms and ammunition to the States of North and South Dakota. Mr. Manderson moved to amend it by also including the State of Nebraska. Mr. Voorhees said that if the proposition were one to issue 100,000 rations of food to the starving Indians it would be more consistent with Christian civilization. After further debate by Messrs. Dawes and Voorhees, Mr. Pierce said: I am nearer to the Indians than Gen. Miles is. I have no doubt but that in some of the agencies there are Indians who complain of insufficient food. But I do question very much whether Gen. Miles made the statement attributed to him in the newspapers. If the senator from Indiana were starving and had a Winchester rifle, I venture to say that he could get a barrel of flour without any trouble.

HOUSE.

The pending business was the further consideration of the copyright bill. Mr. Simonds, of Connecticut, in charge of the bill, stated that the friends of the measure were willing to have a vote taken immediately but expressed his readiness to yield any time that its opponents might desire. A vote was then taken and resulted yeas 139; nays 95; so the bill was passed.

Friday December 5.

Saturday December, 6.

SENATE.

Senator Gray finished his speech in opposition to the election bill.

Mr. Hoar asked unanimous consent to have a reprint of the bill—the sections in the original bill and in the senate substitute to be in parallel columns. The motion gave rise to a long discussion, in which numerous and somewhat variant explanations were given by Republican members of the committee on privileges and elections to the action of the majority on the domiciliary provision of the bill.

The house amendment to the senate joint resolution for the issue of arms to the state of North and South Dakota, Wyoming and Nebraska was concurred in by the senate. It extends its provisions to the state of Montana.

The senate adopted a resolution calling on the secretary of the treasury for a statement of moneys paid to John I. Davenport of New York as chief supervisor of elections in each year since 1871, and a statement of claims of Davenport's that have been rejected at the treasury.

HOUSE.

Wasington, Dec. 10.—The house passed the bill providing for a rebate on tobacco in stock equal to the reduction made in the internal revenue tax by the last tariff bill. Mr. McKinley merely stated that the bill was similar to the provisions of the tariff bill, section 30, which had been omitted in the enrolling of that measure, and on the declaration of Mr. Mills of Texas that it was "all right," no opposition was made to its passage. The house also adopted the resolution declaring that nothing in the tariff act should be construed to impair the provisions of the Hawaiian treaty.

The Postoffices.

Washington, Special Telegram, Dec. 10.—Representative Wilson to-day secured the appointment of John Lyons as postmaster at Carrollton, Wash. A lively contest is going on for the postmastership at Castle Rock, Wash., and Mr. Wilson is in considerable of a quandary as to whom he shall recommend.

A man named Rakavitz, living in the town of Krain, Stearns county, was found by his daughter suspended to the limb of a tree. The decline in the price of wheat and the loss of some land by the resurvey of the town rendered him insane and led to the deed. He was in good circumstances.

The grist mill at Marshall known as the Kendall mill was burned, evidently the work of some incendiary, as the mill was not running and no one staid in it. The mill was built several years ago, but since the new roller mill started the property has not been a paying investment. It is understood that it was sold a few days ago to parties east.

A remarkable formation was seen in the sky at Northfield. Due west there was a half-ball of fire from which rose a pillar of the same reddish hue extending well nigh to the zenith. The color and intensity varied, now being fiercely distinct, then nearly invisible. Later on a second pillar appeared beside the first one and these were followed by a third one in the southwest which was of a whitish hue.

A queer legal case is pending in Minneapolis. A supposed dead man came to life during the funeral, but the undertaker refused to take note of the change in circumstances and demanded his pay. The family claim that they owe him nothing because he did not complete his contract to bury the lamented one, while the undertaker declares that they committed a breach of faith in not furnishing a genuine corpse, and wants $10,000.

The supreme court of Minnesota holds that bank checks are not cash, and do not possess legal value as money until cashed. In other words, the giving of a check on a bank is not payment when passed between debtor and creditor, but only becomes so when the money is received on it. The Minnesota court rules further that in accepting a check from a debtor there is no legal presumption that the creditor takes it in absolute payment, but only conditionally, or as a written acknowledgement of the debt.

The farmers of Pipestone county are now ready for a sugar factory. One or two of them had small trial patches of sugar beets for seed sent from the department of agriculture at Washington this year, and the yield was something like 400 bushels per acre. Samples of the beets were sent to Washington, and, after a government analysis, were pronounced first-class. This has aroused the farmers and, many small patches will be planted next spring, and should a factory be located so that beets can be profitably shipped, a good share of the county would at once be turned into a huge beet field.

Governor Miller has made the production of sheep and wool a special study, and as the result of his observations, and information obtained both from those who have been practically engaged in sheep raising and from those who have been purchasing sheep and placing them among the farmers, he is lead to believe that it is a profitable industry, and one which will rapidly grow and do much to add to the substantial wealth of the agricultural interests of the state.

There was an exciting runaway at Grand Forks. A couple of double teams came dashing down the street four abreast. Directly in the way of the runaways stood Mr. James Little's double wagon, in which were seated Mr. Little and a companion. Seeing their danger they endeavored to pull out of the way but were unsuccessful. The pole of Collins & Murphy's team struck Mr. Little's valuable gray mare right back of the front leg, breaking the fifth and sixth ribs.

Bismarck Tribune: Coal has been discovered on the north shore of Grass lake, extending one and a half mile in length. The coal lies under about one-half feet of dirt. The coal itself is three or four feet thick and raises at about six inches to the yard, as it is mined back from the shore. The coal is of a good quality and lies just above the level of the water. The farmers are consequently having a picnic, as one man can dig from five to six loads a day. It is being hauled out at the rate of fifteen to twenty loads a day.

Grafton Times: Nearly all the Grafton people remember the sprightly and energetic E. W. Veterinary Surgeon Langdon, in Fargo Republican: I went thirteen miles south of Bismarck to examine some horses, and, finding two of them had glanders, I killed them. A Mr. Garnier had charge of them, and I learned that, a short time before, his son-in-law who owned them, had died of the same disease, which he evidently caught from the horses. He had been attended by Dr. Kendrick, of Bismarck, and it was an unmistakable case of glanders. A Boy's School Life.

A boy's school life, so far as it falls within the view of this paper, is broadly divisible into three parts. The first of these extends from the age of ten to thirteen or fourteen, the second from thirteen to sixteen, the third from sixteen to the end. In the first his education will be limited to the subjects of primary and universal value, and to these treated simply and effectively. He will learn Latin and French and elementary mathematics, English grammar, history and geography, and such simple facts of nature as can be taught in the open air. So far he will remain in the hands of his preparatory schoolmaster. Between thirteen and fourteen he will pass into the public school. If he begins his public school life earlier he will be too young to bear its liberty; if later, he will be too old to imbibe its spirit. Soon afterward it will be necessary to decide whether the literary part of his education shall take its color from the literature of the ancient or of the modern world—in other words, whether he shall or shall not learn Greek. If he learns Greek it will necessarily occupy much of his time in the next two years; if not, he will expend the time so saved upon German or additional French or mathematics. These are the years, too, in which he will best acquire the indispensable minimum of scientific knowledge. But neither in these years nor at any later time will he be permitted to abandon the main body of the primary subjects, although it may happen that toward the end of his school life he will not retain his hold upon them all. At sixteen he will make the great choice of his life. In making it, he will be guided by his tastes, faculties, needs and opportunities. Whatever it be that he is led to study in the four great educational lines—classical, mathematical, modern and scientific—he will devote at least half his time to it. It may well be hoped that an education so definite, yet so elastic, will correspond to the large variety of educational demands.—[Head Master of Harrow School, in the Contemporary Review.

SINGLE TAX DEPARTMENT.

TAXING LAND VALUES.

[Henry George in N. Y. Standard.]

A very common objection to the proposition to concentrate all taxes on land values is that the land owner would add the increased tax on the value of his land to the rent that must be paid by his tenants. It is this notion that increased taxation of land values would fall upon the users, not upon the owners of the land, that more perhaps than any thing else prevents men from seeing the far-reaching and beneficent effects of doing away with the taxes that now fall upon labor or the products of labor and taking for public use those values which attach to land by reason of the growth and progress of society.

The taxes levied upon land values, or, to use the politico-economic term, taxes levied upon rent, do not fall upon the user of land, and can not be transferred by the landlord to the tenant, is conceded by all economists of reputation. However much they may dispute as to other things, there is no dispute upon this point. Whatever flimsy reasons any of them may have deemed it expedient to give why the tax on rent should not be more resorted to, they all admit that the taxation of rent merely diminishes the profits of the land owner, can not be shifted on the user of land, can not add to prices, or check production. Not to multiply authorities, it will be sufficient to quote John Stuart Mill. He says (section 2, chapter 3, book 5, "Principles of Political Economy"):

A tax on rent falls wholly on the landlord. There are no means by which he can shift the burden upon any one else. It does not affect the value or price of agricultural produce, for this is determined by the cost of production in the most unfavorable circumstances, and in those circumstances, as we have so often demonstrated, no rent is paid. A tax on rent, therefore, has no effect other than its obvious one. It merely takes so much from the landlord and transfers it to the State.

The reason of this will be clear to every one who has grasped the accepted theory of rent—that theory to which the name of Ricardo has been given, and which, as John Stuart Mill says, has but to be understood to be proved. And it will be clear to every one who will consider a moment, even if he has never before thought of the cause and nature of rent. The rent of land represents a return to ownership over and above the return which is sufficient to induce use—it is a premium paid for permission to use. To take, in taxation, part or the whole of this premium, in no way affects the incentive to use or the return to use; in no way, diminishes the amount of land there is to use, or makes it more difficult to obtain it for use. Thus there is no way in which a tax upon rent or land values can be transferred to the user. Whatever the State may demand of this premium simply diminishes the net amount which ownership can get for its use, or the price which it can demand as purchase money, which is, of course, rent, or the expectation of rent, capitalized.

Here, for instance, is a piece of land that has a value—let it be where it may. Its rent, or value, is the highest price that any one will give for it—it is a premium which the man who wants to use the land must pay to the man who owns the land for permission to use it. Now, if a tax be levied on that rent or value, this in no wise adds to the willingness of any one to pay more for the land than before; nor does it in any way add to the ability of the owner to demand more. To suppose, in fact, that such a tax could be thrown by land owners upon tenants, is to suppose that the owners of land do not now get for their land all it will bring, is to suppose that, simply whenever they want to, they can put up prices as they please.

This is, of course, absurd. There would be no limit whatever to prices, did the fixing of them rest entirely with the seller. To the price which will be given and received for anything, two wants or wills must concur—the want or will of the buyer, and the want or will of the seller. The one wants to give as little as he can, the other to get as much as he can, and the point at which the exchange will take place is the point where these two desires come to a balance or effect a compromise. In other words, price is determined by the equation of supply and demand. And, evidently, taxation can not affect price unless it affects the relative power of one or the other of the elements of this equation. The mere wish of the seller to get more, the mere desire of the buyer to pay less, can neither raise nor lower prices. Nothing will lower prices unless it either increases supply or decreases demand. Now, the taxation of land values, which is simply the taking by the State of a part of the premium which the land owner can get for the permission to use land, neither increases the demand for land nor decreases the supply of land, and therefore can not increase the price which the land owner can get from the user. Thus it is impossible for land owners to throw such taxation on land users by raising rents. Other things being unaltered, rents would be no higher than before, while the selling price of land, which is determined by net rent, would be much diminished. Whoever purchased land outright would have to pay less to the seller, because he would therefore be called on to pay more to the State.

But, while the taxation of land values can not raise rents, it would especially in a country like this, where there is so much valuable land unused, tend strongly to lower them. In all our cities and through all the country, there is much land which is not used, or not put to its best use, because it is held at high prices by men who do not want to or who can not use it themselves, but who are holding it in expectation of profiting by the increased value which the growth of population will give to it in future. Now, the effect of the taxation of land values would be to compel these men to seek tenants or purchasers. Land upon which there is no taxation even a poor man can easily hold for higher prices, for land eats nothing. But put heavy taxation upon it, and even a rich man will be driven to seek purchasers or tenants, and to get them he will have to put down the price he asks, instead of putting it up; for it is by asking less, not by asking more, that those who have any thing they are forced to dispose of must seek customers. Rather than continue to pay heavy taxes upon land yielding him nothing, and from the future increase in value, of which he could have no expectation or profit, since increase in value would mean increased taxes, he would be glad to give it away or to let it revert to the State. Thus the dogs in the manger, who all over the country are withholding land that they can not use themselves from those who would be glad to use it, would be forced to let go their grasp. To tax land values up to anywhere near their full amount would be to utterly destroy speculative values, and to diminish all rents into which this speculative element enters. And, how groundless is it to think that landlords who have tenants could shift a tax on land values upon their tenants, can be readily seen from the effect upon landlords who have no tenants. It is when tenants seek for land, not when landlords seek for tenants, that rent goes up.

To put the matter in a form in which it can be easily understood let us take two cases. The one, a country where the available land is all in use and the competition of tenants has carried rents to a point at which the tenant pays the landlord all he can possibly earn save just enough to barely live. The other, a country where all the available land is not in use and the rent that the landlord can get from the tenant is limited by the terms on which the tenant can get access to unused land. How, in either case, if a tax were imposed upon land values (or rent) could the landlord compel the tenant to pay it?

It may be well to call attention to the fact that a tax on land values is not a tax on land. They are very different things, and the difference should be noted because a confusion of thought as to them may lead to the assumption that a tax on land values would fall on the user. A tax upon land—that is to say, a tax on all land of so much per acre or so much per foot—would fall on the user, barring such effect as it might have on speculation. For such a tax, falling equally on all land—on the poorest and least advantageously situated as fully as on the richest and best situated land, would become a condition imposed on the use of any land, from which there could be no escape, and thus the owners of rentable land could add it to their rents. Its operation would be anologous to that of a tax on a producible commodity, and it would in effect reduce the supply of land that could be used, since no land could then be used that would not yield sufficient to pay the tax. But a tax on economic rent or land values would not fall on all land; it would fall only on valuable land, and on that in proportion to its value. It would thus not have to be paid upon the poorest land in use (which always determines rent), and so would not become a condition of use, or restrict the amount of land that could be profitably used, and so the land owners on whom it fell could not shift it on the users of land. This distinction, as to nature and effects, between a tax on land and a tax on land values, it is necessary to bear in mind.

It is also necessary to bear in mind that the value of land is something totally distinct from the value of improvements. It is a value which arises not from the exertion of any particular individual, but from the growth and progress of the community. A tax on land values, therefore, never lessens the reward of exertion or accumulation. It simply takes for the whole community that value which the whole community creates.

While it is not true that a tax on land values or rent falls on the user, and thus distributes itself through increased prices, it is true that the greater number of taxes by which our public revenues are raised do. Thus, speaking generally, taxes upon capital fall, not upon the owners of capital, but upon the users of capital, and are by them transferred to the consumers of whatever the capital is used to produce; taxes upon buildings or building materials must ultimately be paid in increased building rents or prices by the occupiers of buildings; imposts upon production or duties upon imports must finally fall upon the consumers of the commodities. This fact is far from being popularly appreciated, for, if it were, the masses would never consent to the system by which the greater part of our revenues are raised. But, nevertheless, it is the vague apprehension of this that leads by confusion of ideas to the notion that a tax on land values must add to rents. This notion will disappear if it be considered how it is that any tax given to the person first called on to pay it the power of shifting it upon others by an increase of price. The general principle is this: A tax upon any thing or upon the methods or means of production of any thing, the price of which is kept down by the ability to produce increased supplies, will, by increasing the cost of production, check the supply and thus add to the price of the thing, and ultimately fall on the consumer. But a tax upon any thing upon which the supply is fixed or monopolized, and of which the cost of production is not therefore a determining element, since it has no effect in checking supply, does not increase prices, and falls entirely on the owner.

That Telegraph Pole,

Lewiston Journal.

"Struck a queer old fellow up country," said one of the men who planted the poles for a new telegraph company in this State.

"He first came across us about two miles from his house as he was driving home from the village.

"Says he, 'Coming up my way with them air?'

"'Guess so,' said I.

"'Wal, don't yer tech the sile along my fence. Wouldn't have one 'er them poles planted 'erlong side my premises for a hundred. Spile the looks of everything.'

"I told him that we would see about it and he rode away swearing bloody murder. Well, we got up to his farm late the next day, and if it wasn't a dirty mean place then I'll eat a coil of wire. Blinds off, barn caved in, old pung canted up in the front yard, oh, it gave me a pain. Old Particular was there in full war-paint. He cursed and blew and threatened when we began to set a pole in his door-yard. But we went ahead with the biz and left with the earache. The man said he'd never sleep till he'd chopped the old gallers down and he wouldn't eat till he'd used the wood to cook his grub.

"I laughed when I drove down by that house a few days ago, about a year after we planted the poles. It looked as though old huffy had become pretty well reconciled to 'that outrage.'

"His wife had hitched a clothes-line on to that pole and he had used it for the corner post of a shelter shed. Then on t'other side he had nailed a cleat and hung up a bush scythe and mud hoe; a calf and a big sheep were hitched to it. He had some boards, some iron rods and bolts lying near and as near as I could judge was getting ready to swing a gate on the much enduring pole. Above embellishments on the pole two signs. 'ShoTes foR Sale' and 'OrKtiOn nexT TeWsdaY.'

"I called the kicker out of the tie-up and informed him that we should move the pole, and as I hurriedly drove away I hearn him shouting, 'Why, then to gosh 't all Joos'lum don' ye? It's been an eye-sore ever sence you struck it in my door-yard!"

Then His Honor Rose Up.

From the Omaha World Herald.

August Uthoff is an Elkhorn saloon-keeper, who was arrested recently charged with selling liquor on the Sabbath. He was taken before a justice at Elkhorn for trial, and straightway moved for a change of venue.

"What's that?" the court asked.

"We don't want to be tried by you," Uthoff's attorney responded.

The judge looked at him in astonishment. Uthoff's attorney expected a fine for contempt of court, but he escaped that.

"I'd like to know why not?" the court remarked warmly.

"Well, we have an affidavit here to the effect that we feel that we cannot secure a fair and impartial trial.

"You're a liar!"

"You're unfriendly to us."

"You're an infernal, no account, worthless liar. You and your client ought to be in jail.

The justice rose up and roared.

"You make me tired," he cried. "Do you think this court is going to have you pawing all over the country like Dogknees looking for a man with a lantern to suit your pleasure? Think the law is a thing to be tried on like a suit of clothes? You sit down there and give your evidence."

Uthoff's attorney complied and the result was his client was fined a $100 and was sent to jail. But the attorney appeared before the district court, recited the facts, and the saloon man was released.

Had No Car Fare.

Senator Jones, of Nevada, was put off a street car in San Francisco because he did not happen to have a nickel in his pocket to pay his fare. The story of the incident traveled through the west, and his friends in a spirit of humor and friendship had a gold headed cane made, which contained in the handle a compartment sufficiently large to store one hundred five cent nickels.

The simple pressure of the thumb releases a nickel, and another slips into place ready for use, like the cartridges in a magazine gun. On the handle was engraved "United States Senator J. P. Jones, with the best wishes of his Utah friends." The cane was formally presented to the senator recently by ex-Governor West, of Utah, in the presence of a number of senators and representatives.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

The Nation's Jewels.

Uncle Sam has some of the finest jewels in the United States. Stored away in his National museum at Washington are bushels of gold, quarts of precious stones, dozens of beautiful pearls, and china and cut glass which are worth their weight in gold. It takes four large cases to contain the uncut gems belonging to our governmental [illegible], and the largest parlor in the United States would be crowded with cases which contain [illegible] articles of carved gold.

The gems are kept in three plate glass cases laid on blue velvet pads, and it dazzles one's eyes to look at them. Many of them came from America, some are from India, and some have strange histories connected with them. The jewels which were lying in the treasury department at Washington [illegible] them. Professor [illegible] had them sent over to the museum [illegible]. Among them are the jewels which the Sultan of Muscat, in Arabia, gave to President Van Buren, but which, according to the rules of our government, he was not able to keep and had to hand over to the treasury department.

There was no provision as to what should be done with them, and they lay unseen in the vaults for years. Among them are two large pearls as big as pigeons' eggs. These are unset, and are as pretty as when they came from the head of an oyster many years ago. Besides there are 150 pearls, each as big around as a marrowfat pea and each having a hole pierced through it. They were evidently intended for a necklace. On another pad there are 130 diamonds received at the same time. These are not large, but they are very pure and white, and they look like big dewdrops as they shine out upon the blue velvet.—Cor. New York's Italians.

There are 50,000 Italians in this city and they are coming in at the rate of about 1,000 per week. Most of these come from lower Italy and sail thence from Naples, though they are not Neapolitans by any means. The abolition of the padrone system in New York has rather encouraged Italian immigration than decreased it. The padrone system, while it seemed to offer an easier way for poor Italians to come to America, kept them in slavery while they were here for such a length of time that it served as a warning to those of their native land to remain where they were.

The laws of the United States have operated in favor of Italian immigration. It would really seem as though the descendants of Christopho Columbo had made up their minds to claim this country. So far as the Italian population of New York is concerned, they form a very industrious feature of the community. They are also economical livers and quite desirable as American citizens. They have monopolized here the larger portion of all the smaller trades and especially that which relates to street traffic of all kinds. As most of the Italian immigrants stop here in New York, it will soon form a difficult problem to grapple with.—New York Cor. Pittsburg Dispatch.

Fish That Bite Only by Electric Light.

A reporter whom chance took to the water front one evening was treated in the course of his rambles among the hole flecked wharves to a novel sight. At the foot of Beale street he saw some twenty men, women and boys sitting about a square mass of piling bordering an open space of water, which was brilliantly lighted by a neighboring electric light, fishing! They rapidly pulled up their nets—for hooks were not used—each filled with from six to a dozen fish. Fish could be seen leaping frequently from the water.

During the daytime the place is deserted by fish. At night, when the adjacent electric light is lit, the brightness attracts the finny wanderers. They gather in such numbers that to catch them with baited hooks would be tiresome. For this reason the crowds that gather there nightly fashion nets out of hoops and draw the strings close together. No bait is used, and the fish entangle themselves in the net by the dozen. A few nights ago one man caught 200 pounds of fish, mostly rock cod and sardines of unusual size.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Was Not Looking for Work.

One morning about 9 o'clock a short, thick set man, with white hair and mustache and piercing eyes, walked into the publishing house of Charles Scribner's Sons and asked the way to the subscription department. Having learned it, he ran nimbly upstairs and entered the main office, where he inquired for Mr. Thomas, the manager of the department. Mr. Thomas had not come down town yet, but was expected at any moment, said the clerk in charge, and the caller was invited to take a seat. He accepted the invitation. After a few moments an idea seemed to strike the clerk, and he said that if the gentleman wished to become an agent for Stanley's "In Darkest Africa" he could give him all the necessary information. The stranger thanked him and replied that modesty forbade his becoming an agent for the sale of the book, as he had written it himself.—Critic.

A Cat's Sense of Smell.

In one particular feline intelligence surpasses anything exhibited by dogs. Repeated experiments have verified the almost incredible fact that cats conveyed in bags or baskets to distant places can find their way back to the point of departure. According to the well known naturalist, Mr. A. R. Wallace, this marvelous achievement is due to an extraordinary development of the sense of smell, which enables the cat to take note of the successive odors encountered on the way, and to follow them back in their proper inverse order. It is doubtful whether even this hypothesis will explain all the recorded examples of a cat's faculty for identifying localities traversed blindfold.—New York Ledger.

Photographed from Several Sides.

One of the fads of the photographic art that has reached Nashville is a device by means of which at one sitting a picture of the subject may be taken in several different positions. For example: By one exposure to the camera a picture of a man standing directly in front of the instrument, his profile from the left side and his profile from the right side may be taken. A man may thus get a picture at once that shows how he looks all round, and if he ever meets himself in the road he may know who it is without waiting for an introduction.—Nashville American.

Men with Three Eyes.

There is a tradition among the Persians and the Jews of eastern Palestine that the old patriarchs and people in general had three eyes, one in the back part of the head, prior to the time Moses was given the law on the tables of stone. On that eventful day Moses commanded his followers to turn their faces from Sinai. This they did, but took care to uncover the other eye, which Moses commanded to henceforth be forever closed.—St. Louis Republic.

ROYALTY AND REPARTEE.

Court Fools Who Have Turned the Laugh on Mighty Sovereigns.

Decidedly the worst of the exchange did an eastern sovereign receive when, having bought several horses from some merchants, he gave them a lac of rupees to purchase more for him.

Soon after they had departed he in a sportive humor ordered his vizier to make out a list of all the fools in his dominions.

He did so, and put his majesty's name at the head of them.

The king asked why.

He replied, "Because you intrusted a lac of rupees to men you didn't know, and who will never come back."

"Aye, but suppose they should come back?"

"Then," said the vizier, "I shall erase your name and insert theirs."

As is well known the king was extremely fond of disputation, but as he generally terminated the discussion by collaring his antagonist and kicking his shins few of his guests were disposed to enter into the arena against him.

One day, when he was even more anxious than usual for an argument, he turned to a nobleman and asked why he did not express his opinion.

"It is impossible, your majesty," was the reply, "to express an opinion before a sovereign who has such strong convictions, and who wears such very thick boots."

In the answer which a German prince was given there seems to be a rebuke for his misgovernment implied. Having in a dream seen three rats—one fat, the other lean and the third blind—he sent for a celebrated Bohemian gypsy and demanded an explanation.

"The first rat," said she, "is your prime minister, the lean rat your people and the blind rat yourself."

A very good hint was also smartly put by Mr. Coutts, the banker, to the Duke of York.

The duke having said to Coutts, "I think, sir, you have been my banker for more than twenty years?" the banker retorted:

"Your royal highness, I think, may be said to have been my banker during that time, as my money has been in your hands, not your money in mine."

Perhaps, though, the richest piece of humor ever told of royalty, in that one of the principal actors in the scene was most likely unconscious of the rapier keenness of his retort, will be found in the following:

One of the shahs of Persia was more anxious than able to acquire fame as a poet. He had just completed a new performance in very "peculiar meter" and summoned the court poet into the royal presence to hear the poem read.

The laureate was either an unusually conscientious courtier or he was afraid of losing his berth if his master took to rhyming on his own account, and when his opinion was asked he condemned the composition.

The shah, enraged at this uncourtly criticism, gave orders that the court poet should be taken to the stable and tied up in the same stall with a donkey. Here the poor sinner remained until his royal rival had perpetrated another poem, when he was again commanded to appear before the throne and submit to a second infliction of sovereign dullness. He listened in silence while the new poem was read, and at the conclusion, his opinion being required, he fell upon his knees and significantly exclaimed to the royal author, "Send me back to the donkey!"—London Tit-Bits.

Nat Goodwin's Experience at Carlsbad.

Have you ever heard how Nat C. Goodwin effected a cure at Carlsbad? He had been ailing for months, was all run down and everybody advised him to go to Europe. So go he did, taking his wife with him. In Europe everybody told him he ought to try Carlsbad. He went to Carlsbad, secured lodgings and settled down. Took a walk around town, consulted a doctor, tried to find something to do and finally went to bed out of sheer despair. Got up next morning, visited the spring, took one taste of the water, tried to talk with several other invalids—all foreigners. Went back to his lodgings and began to pack up.

"Come on, Lizzie," said he.

"Why, Nat, what do you mean? Where are you going?" she asked.

"I'm going home," said he. "I came here to get well, but I'll die if I stay here twenty-four hours longer."

"Oh, yes, I am," said he; "I'm cured of Carlsbad, and that's experience enough for one summer."—Eugene Field in Chicago News.

A Remarkably Sensitive Scale.

A great many ingenious devices owe their origin to taking some old familiar appliance and making it serve a new purpose. Hardly any invention is more common than a pendulum clock, and yet from one of its parts an American inventor has developed a scale much more sensitive than the best knife edge balance. If the wire rod by which a pendulum rod hangs is examined the upper end, where it is fastened to the clock frame, will be found flattened into the form of a spring. As a spring the metal sways to and fro with the minimum of friction. Suspending the horizontal rod of his balance from just such a spring, the inventor has been able not only to construct an exquisitely sensitive scale, measuring one part in 2,250,000, but also to build a testing machine, in which steel bars are drawn out and broken as easily as if they were glass, and in which the force at work is indicated with the utmost accuracy.—New York Telegram.

Paper from Banana Plants.

A new factor is entering the paper makers' market. It has been proved that the banana plant contains a greater quantity of pure fiber than any other of the numerous vegetable products used for the manufacture of paper. During the first twelve months of its vegetation the plant only produces a single bunch of fruit, after which it dies; but from its roots four to ten young plants spring up. The adaptation of the plant to commercial purposes will, it is anticipated, revolutionize the paper material market, and largely affect the industry. The plant is easy of cultivation and has long since been recognized by the wandering tribes of Central America as yielding many useful adjuncts to everyday domestic requirements.—New York Telegram.

Ministers Are Like Cats.

"My experiences with churches make me think that ministers are like cats. When you go to a new place first everybody says:

" 'Come pussy! come pussy! nice pussy!' and you come.

"Then they begin to rub your fur and say:

GILPIN'S RAILROAD SCHEME.

The project of ex-Governor Gilpin, of Colorado, to build a line of railway through the wilds of Alaska to Cape Prince of Wales, to connect with the Russian railway system through Siberia, thus linking the old and the new worlds with a railroad, is a feasible one and the future will see it accomplished. But there is a giant obstacle in the way of one unbroken line connecting the two hemispheres, and this is Behring straits. Mr. Gilpin's proposition is to bridge these straits, which is all well enough in theory, but quite a different thing in practice.

At considerable expense the straits can undoubtedly be bridged, as an island lies about midway between the Asiatic and American shores; the distance is not great and the waters shallow, the government charts showing the greatest depth to be only thirty-two fathoms.

But could a bridge be built high enough to allow towering icebergs to pass under it, and with strength to withstand the great ice floes that are yearly swept down through the straits from the Arctic ocean? The current in sweeping through the narrow straits from one great sea into another is very swift and strong, and great icebergs would be borne against the bridge, its piers and abutments with a force that neither steel stringers nor mason work would stand against.

Should the structure stand for a time it must ultimately give way before the great ice block, with the current of the Arctic ocean sweeping against it, that would follow any obstruction to its passage. The ice flow is the only difficulty in the way of bridging Behring straits, and it is one that is insurmountable. A ship railway across the straits could run in the summer only, as the straits freeze over during the winter, and, as Capt. Emory, of the United States ship Thetis, stated, the only practical means of crossing these straits at all seasons of the year is by tunneling under them.

The character of the coast line of Alaska is such that railway building along it would encounter obstacles almost as great as the ice floes in Behring straits. The mountains are rugged and precipitous in the extreme; they break in precipice sheer into the sea, and run back to altitudes of from 600 to nearly 20,000 feet, and the crest of the range is capped with eternal snow and ice. Every canyon is an inlet from the sea which, octopus like, seems to cling with mighty arms to the mountains for support. Thus channels are navigable for the largest ships, and, curious as it may seem, great steamships glide up these narrow canyons, with barely passage room on either side for miles, and come to anchor directly under the towering ice capped peaks, in the very heart of the coast range.

Where the waters of the sea end in these canyons come in the arms of a glacier, with a surface like an angry sea and cracked and seamed in every direction. These glacial arms extend back to the crest of the range, where they join the main glacier, which expands into a vast field of ice, as it were, the glacier reaching its long arms down from above, and the sea reaching up from below, and clasping hands half way upon the mountain side.

Late scientific investigations have proven that these glaciers move—that, at the rate of from a fraction of an inch to a foot or two daily, they are slipping down to the sea, and, with a regularity that is remarkable, hurl from their fronts acres of ice at a time into the waters. A difficulty in railway building across these ice fields would be that a break would float a whole train of cars out to sea.

Through the interior of Alaska, rather than along the coast, lies the route for Governor Gilpin's railroad, across the headwaters of the Stickeen and down the great valley of the Yukon.—Alaska Cor. Rocky Mountain News.

Relics of Gen. Grant.

The gold articles in the Grant collection would fill a peck measure, and every city seems to have given Grant a gold box containing the paper in which the freedom of the town was presented to him. The box which he received at Ayr, Scotland, is as big as a cigar box, and is of solid gold. The city of Glasgow gave him a still bigger one, beautifully chased, and the gold box which he received from the city of London is a wonder of artistic workmanship, bearing the engraving of the capital on one side and the London Guildhall on the other.

Then there is a wonderfully beautiful cigar case of pure gold from the king of Siam, a model of the table on which Lee's surrender was signed of solid gold, and a solid gold invitation card as big as a postal card and about four times as thick, which was sent to Grant in a solid silver envelope, inviting him to a masked ball at San Francisco.

The Washington relics have only a few silver articles, but they contain many fine pieces of china and cut glass. The punch bowl is as big as a half bushel. Some of the plates were given by Lafayette to Mrs. Washington, and the museum has lately received from the family of Lewis Washington a number of autograph letters which have never been published.—Washington Cor. Pittsburg Dispatch.

Platinum More Valuable Than Gold.

Prices of false teeth have gone up, but the rise was caused solely by the scarcity of platinum, of which metal the little pins are made with which to fasten each tooth to the plate. All the platinum of commerce comes from Russian mines in the Ural mountains, and the supply is hardly sufficient for the demand at present. The consumption of platinum has greatly increased since the electric lighting companies began its use. Did you ever observe the tiny, hairlike wire loop in each incandescent light?

That wire is made of platinum, which is one of the very hardest of metals. The price of platinum has gone up to about $20 an ounce, which is considerably higher than 22-carat gold. Thus it comes about that platinum is literally "worth its weight in gold," and more too. This may now with propriety be classed among "the precious metals." It is found in Oregon and several other parts of the United States, but not in commercial quantities.—New York Star.

Dr. Talmage and Ruskin.

I was talking to Dr. Talmage a few evenings ago, and he said: "It was a turning point with me when in Wynkoop's book store in Syracuse many years ago, when a youth, I picked out from a heap of books a volume entitled, 'The Beauties of Ruskin.' It was only a book of extracts, but it was all pure honey, and I was unsatisfied until I had purchased all of Ruskin's works. And what a heaven I went through in reading his 'Seven Lamps of Architecture' and his 'Stones of Venice' it is impossible for me to describe, except that it gave me rapture for good books and an everlasting disgust for decrepit or immoral books that will last me while I live."—Edward W. Bok's Letter.

Chung, the Chinese Giant.

"Chang," the celebrated Chinese giant, who when on exhibition was a great attraction in this country, is now living in honorable retirement at Bournemouth, the air of which he finds to be particularly adapted to his not very robust constitution. Though he is yet far from an old man, signs are not absent that age is beginning to tell upon him. There are "silver threads among the gold" in the small quantity of hair which he allows to grow on the crown of his head, and it is stated that he is not so erect in carriage as formerly. His present height is about 8 feet.

Notwithstanding his long residence in this country he speaks but indifferent English, though he is an adept in the "flowery language" of his native country. Chang is by no means an indolent member of the community. He takes a great interest in charitable and philanthropic objects, and gives material assistance in all kinds of Christian work, as many people both in and beyond his adopted town can testify. He opened a bazar at Ryde, Isle of Wight, in aid of the Young Women's Christian association, and he draws a large audience wherever he goes.—London Tit-Bits.

Being Naturalized.

I was rather amused just on the eve of the last day of registration to listen to some of the quaint answers returned to the questions asked of applicants in the court of common pleas before admission to citizenship. In many cases they were more amusing than stupid, and unconsciously contained no little truth, as when an Italian defined the business of an assemblyman as making money in Albany. The most amusing case of all, however, was that of an Irishman. He had answered every question correctly until the court asked:

"Are you attached to a republican form of government?"

"Indeed, and I'm not."

"But you must understand that except you are attached to this form of government you cannot be naturalized. Why are you not favorably disposed to the republican form of government?"

"Because, your honor, I'm a Democrat."

When it was explained to him that there was a wide difference between a citizen of a republic and a member of the Republican party he duly qualified.—New York Star.

Food for Dogs.

William Sayer says: Dogs should be fed in accordance with what they are intended to do. A fighting dog may be fed with raw beef and blood, a diet that makes him savage, and which has the same effect on a fighting cock. Hunting dogs, on the contrary, should never be allowed to taste blood, for it will give them an appetite for raw flesh, and will sometimes lead them to steal the game. The best food for hunting and house dogs is the beef crackling that comes from the rendering works. It is thoroughly cooked, and contains enough oleaginous matter to be warming and enough muscular tissue to be nutritious. With some kind of coarse bread it keeps the dog in good physical condition, does not stupefy or make him dull, and it is cheap enough to make it a point to buy it for dog feed.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Realized a Fortune on the Deal.

"Where do garnets come from?" was asked of a traveler for an eastern jewelry firm.

"Garnets! Why, they are as cheap as dirt in the raw. You can buy all of the rough garnets you want for from ten to twenty cents a pound. The cutting is what makes them valuable. The majority of them are found in the archæan or granite formation and in porphyritic formations. You find tin and you find garnets. When those three Cornishmen brought seven tons of pure cassitrite ore from Cornwall to salt a 'fake' tin mine in the Black Hills they did not forget the garnets. They shot the earth full of tin ore and garnets with shotguns, and realized about $240,000 on the deal.—Chicago Tribune.

The Number of Teeth.

In the majority of mammals the teeth are limited in number and defined in their forms. The number ranges from one in the narwhal to 220 in the dolphin. The average is thirty-two; the types with this number being represented by man, the apes and the ruminants. Forty-four is called the typical or normal number. The animals in which this number occur are represented by the hog and the mole. The number of teeth in the animals last named is exceeded only in animals of the lower groups.—St. Louis Republic.

Brassy Taste Means Bad Liver.

One of the symptoms of a torpid liver is a brassy taste in the mouth, indicating the presence of cholesterine. Another symptom is specks before the eyes, and these specks are of cholesterine deposited in the crystalline lens of the eye, where they intercept the rays of light. Sometimes these specks float about, moving with each movement of the eyeball. If these specks become very abundant they form an impediment to vision—New York Journal.

Alexandre Dumas, novelist and dramatist, is a generous and cultivated art collector, his private gallery of modern pictures being considered the finest in Paris—city of galleries. His close curling hair and heavy mustache have become quite white. He is a conspicuous figure, while the brilliancy of his talk and the warmth of his nature open all doors to him.

An excellent and quick way to mend broken plaster casts and impressions is to paint the broken surfaces over two or three times with very thick shellac varnish, and at each application to burn out the alcohol over a flame. When the shellac is sufficiently soft, press the parts together and hold in position till cool. It will be as strong as it was before broken.—New York Journal.

He Got It Cheap.

Two travelling hypnotizers agreed to hypnotize a Michigan man for fifty cents, and after he had got it good and strong they wanted $5 to "unhip" him. He refused to pay it and they made a skip, and he is still seeing the red eyes of black cats perched on the footboard of the bedstead.—Detroit Free Press.

How a Woman Cuts a "Friend."

A tender hearted little woman will permit herself to be dragged into an acquaintance which will cause her hours of weeping. She has not the moral courage to deliberately cut the woman, and the woman, being an intrigante, does not mean to let her. At last, however, she does get up enough courage to strike the blow, and the way she does it is very funny. The chances are she meets the undesirable when she is with some man to whom she has told her tale of woe, or else with a woman who knows the world better than she does, and either one of these will give her courage.

She looks at the "creature" (for she has gotten to call her that) and stares vacantly as does a French doll; then she turns to her protector and says: "You see I could do it; but do you suppose she will write me a note about it?" That she can leave the note unanswered never enters her small head, and the "creature" likes nothing better than to have a lot of letters from her victim, that she may display them to her own circle and show how intimate she is.

One of these women went into a well known photographer's here and announced that she must have her picture taken at once, as Mrs. Dash was worrying the life out of her to get it. The chances are that Mrs. Dash never asked her for it, but the men who heard it all concluded that they were bosom friends, and poor little Mrs. Dash will suffer from the stigma of such an acquaintance. Nobody to blame but herself.—New York Letter.

Getting Even.

Not long ago in the Peshawur district a man went so very far to the bad as to shoot a Mullah. It might have been an accident, or he mistook his man, or pure villany; anyhow the Mullah died, and like many another outlaw the murderer had to fly over the border. First he tried Buneyr, but the news had preceded him and he was refused shelter. He then tried the Swat Valley with no better success—the country of the Akhund would have none of him. Even the Afridis, small reverence as they pay to spiritual advisers, would have nothing to say to a ruffian whose hands were died with the blood of a pious man. Wearied at length of being hunted from tribe to tribe he bethought himself of repentance. "None of you will have me," he said; "I can but be a martyr; I will go and kill a Sahib."

So back he came to Peshawur cantonment and walked down to the Mall to look for a victim. Not finding one handy he turned off and went for a cavalry sergeant in difficulties with a troublesome horse, at whom he took deliberate aim. As luck would have it the first bullet was stopped by a range finder the sergeant had on him, but before the latter could go for his assailant the Pathan got another bullet through the sergeant's helmet and made a bolt for it. A plucky native ran in, and the man was ultimately secured, tried by the commissioner the same evening and, under summary powers, hanged the next morning.—E. K. Oliver.

Mrs. Barr's Dog.

Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, the well known authoress, has a great mastiff named Sultan, who acts as playmate, companion and protector at her mountain home on Storm King on the Hudson. Sultan is highly trained, and is one of the most gentlemanly dogs alive. He takes his place in the dining room, and when he sees his favorite dish on the table he steps up to his mistress, and as plainly as anything short of human speech can do it asks to be served, indicating by his eyes the dish he refers to.

Compliance is acknowledged by a polite bow of the big head. Fetching and carrying to any part of the house on order are to him mere puppies' play. Dishes, persons and places around the house and grounds he knows by name. He is by day the autocrat of the lawn, and at night he takes the whole road under such close supervision that none can pass unless they are prepared to produce a certificate of respectability and good intentions.—New York Letter.

Red Uniforms Attract Bullets.

While military men are insisting that the red coat of the British soldier and the red trousers of the French soldier are dangerous, because their colors render them peculiarly liable to be hit, no one seems to have noticed that black is the most deadly of colors, while white is the safest. This has been shown over and over again in the fights which occasionally take place in the southern states between black and white citizens. At one of these fights, which took place in Atlanta, four blacks were killed and eight wounded, while only two white men were hit, and neither of the two was killed.

This shows that a black man is six times as liable to be hit by bullets as is a white man. So, too, in conflicts between red men and white men the former are hit about twice as often as the latter. It is hence evident that soldiers should be dressed exclusively in white, and that the Austrians made a mistake in abandoning their famous white coats.—Paris Herald.

Conducive to Blindness.

The demand for spectacles, and especially for colored or smoked glasses, is constantly on the increase, and unless we are going to be a race of blind people something must soon be done to modify the electric light. It is too strong for weak eyes, and the bright glare on white paper is not good even for the strongest. The arc lights in the streets are very bad, since they cause a constant expansion and contraction of the pupil in the effort to adjust itself to the varying shades of light, but the house lamps are not much better, and many persons complain of their eyes who do not know what ails them. A tinted glass used in the globes of the house lamps would relieve the eye very much. Any tint would answer the purpose—red, yellow or blue, the tint being just enough to take off the sharp glitter of the light and ease the eye.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Waiter Worth $40,000.

Gustave Reicht is said to be worth more than $40,000. For twelve years he has been a familiar figure in the dining room of the Fifth Avenue hotel. He started with $300, and by following the advice of Mr. Rockefeller, the oil king, made his fortune in oil. He is a bachelor, and spends all his spare time in collecting rare coins and postage stamps. He dresses very stylishly when outside, and it is not seldom that he dines at Delmonico's.—New York Telegram.

Treatment of Nose Bleeding.

In The Courrier Medical appears a communication from Dr. Jonathan Hutchinson, in which that surgeon describes the treatment of epistaxis, or nose bleeding—namely, by plunging the feet and hands of the patient in water as hot as can be borne. He declares that the most rebellious cases have never resisted this mode of treatment.

Diamond in an Ice Cake.

A lady in this city lost a valuable diamond eardrop, and after hunting everywhere she could think of for it she gave it up for lost. On taking a cake of ice from the refrigerator one morning to make room for some article she desired to place there, to her surprise her eye rested on the diamond imbedded in the cake, where it had been dropped when the ice had been placed in the chest. It was naturally a welcome discovery.—Lowell Mail.

It is strange how fast American rifles have rid the New World of the larger carnivora. Within the last fifty years wolves and bears have entirely disappeared from hundreds of thousands of square miles where they once were as numerous as rabbits.

"Any color, so it's red," originated among the class of characters called Jakeys in the local drama. One of them being on a committee appointed to procure a new fire engine was asked what color the company desired the apparatus painted. He replied, "Why, any color, so it's red."

"Tipping the wink," generally regarded as a vulgar phrase, is to be found in a grave historical romance. It occurs in "Valerius; a Roman Story," by John Gibson Lockhart, Sir Walter Scott's son-in-law, and for many years editor of The Quarterly Review.

In 1775 George Washington sought to have set apart and reserved to the public forever a square mile of land in the Kanawha valley, in the center of which was a burning gas spring that he regarded as one of the greatest of our national wonders.

The First California Emigrant Train.

On leaving Weston, Mo., where there had been so much opposition, we were six or seven in number and nearly half the town followed us for a mile, and some for five or six miles, to bid us good-by, showing the deep interest felt in our journey. All expressed good wishes and desired to hear from us. When we reached Sapling grove, the place of rendezvous, in May, 1841, there was but one wagon ahead of us. For the next few days one or two wagons would come each day, and among the recruits were three families from Arkansas.

Every one furnished his own supplies. The party consisted of sixty-nine, including men, women and children. Our teams were of oxen, mules and horses. We had no cows, as the later emigrants usually had, and the lack of milk was a great deprivation to the children. It was understood that every one should have not less than a barrel of flour, with sugar and so forth to suit; but I laid in 100 pounds of flour more than the usual quantity, besides other things. This I did because we were told that when we got into the mountains we probably would get out of bread and have to live on meat alone, which I thought would kill me, even if it did not others.

My gun was an old flint lock rifle, but a good one. Old hunters told me to have nothing to do with cap or percussion locks, that they were unreliable, and that if I got my caps or percussion wet I could not shoot, while if I lost my flint I could pick up another on the plains. I doubt whether there was $100 in money in the whole party, but all were enthusiastic and anxious to go.—Gen. John Bidwell in Century.

Ants as Surgeons.

Ants are terrible fighters. They have very powerful jaws, considering the size of their bodies, and therefore their method of fighting is by biting. They will bite one another and hold on with a wonderful grip of the jaws, even after their legs have been bitten off by other ants. Sometimes six or eight ants will be clinging with a death grip to one another, making a peculiar spectacle, some with a leg gone and some with half the body gone. One singular fact is that the grip of an ant's jaw is retained even after the body has been bitten off and nothing but the head remains.

This knowledge is possessed by a certain tribe of Indians in Brazil, who put the ants to a very peculiar use. When an Indian gets a gash cut in his hand, instead of having his hand sewed together, as physicians do in this country, he procures five or six large large black ants, and holding their heads near the gash they bring their jaws together in biting the flesh, and thus pull the two sides of the gash together. Then the Indian pinches off the bodies of the ants and leaves their heads clinging to the gash, which is is held together until it is perfectly healed.—New York [illegible]

When we find a medicine we know to possess genuine merit, we consider it a duty, and take pleasure in telling the public what it is. Such a medicine we found Chamberlain's Cough remedy, last winter, when la grippe was prevailing. We are satisfied that we warded off several attacks that were threatening by the use of this syrup and we have since relieved in a few hours, severe colds, and in the course of two or three days, entirely broken them up by its use, as have several of our friends to whom we have recommended it. It is all that it is represented to be by the manufacturers. If you have cough and want to stop it Chamberlain Cough remedy will do the work, for sale by W. A Schreiter.

A Preventive For Croup.

The discovery of preventive for croup, is one of the most important made in recent years. Since first discovered it has been used in many cases and with unvarying success. Its being within the reach of all makes it the more valuable. It is only necessary to give Chamberlain's cough remedy freely as soon as the first indications of croup appear, and it will dispel all symptoms of the disease. Full directions are given with each bottle. For 50 cents at Schreieters.

There may be persons in this community who are at times troubled with colic, or subject to attacks of bowel complaint. If so, they should try Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy. It will afford almost immediate relief, and when reduced with water is pleasant to take. If taken as soon as the first indication of the disease is felt it will ward off the attack. Many people use it in this way, and find that it never fails them. A 25 or 50 cent bottle may be obtained a W. A. Schreiter's.

TWO REVOLUTIONARY GIRLS.

T. C. Harbaugh in St. Louis Republic: When the revolution broke out the Van Alstines, with numerous other families, inhabited the lovely Mohawk valley. A fairer landscape did not exist, but despite its beauty it soon became the theater of stirring and bloody scenes. It was the battle ground where the Indian waged relentless warfare on the patriot settler, and every rod of it was trodden by the wily and sanguinary foe. The people who then dwelt in this region were a mixture of hardy. New Englanders and of Dutch, the Van Alstines belonging to the latter race; but all were equally brave, the women vieing with the men in deeds of heroism and devotion.

Mrs. Van Alstine, the mother, had passed through some of the most thrilling scenes of colonial history, and, dwelling on the New York frontier in the midst of savage alarms, she had reared a family of fifteen and lived to count almost 100 years of life. Her eldest daughter, Betty, was a child who inherited her mother's bravery and determination. She was still in her "teens" when Sir John Johnson, the famous tory leader of the Mohawk valley, descended on the patroit settlement at the head of a band of tories and Indians, intending to complete the work of devastation which Brant had inaugurated the previous year.

Everybody had cause to fear these merciless marauders, who sometimes plundered friend as well as foe, and it was expteted that the Van Alstines, being staunch patriots, would be among the first visited by the invaders. During Brant's invasion the family had been compelled to seek safety on an island in the river near by, and from the shelter afforded by this retreat, see the houses of their neighbors in flames, their own home being spared by a miracle.

When it was known Sir John and his army were actually on the march, the suffering patriot began to quit their homes.

"You won't go this time, will you, mother!" asked Betty, her eyes kindling with indignation as she looked up into her mother's eyes.

"We haven't decided what to do," was the matron's reply. "We will know to-morrow, if we are spared till then."

That very day just as the sun was sinking behind the lovely hills of the Mohawk, a band of yelling Indians burst upon the little settlement and in a few moments the Van Alstines were surrounded. Escape was not to be thought of now; it was too late.

Mrs. Van Alstine knew that it would be useless to argue with the savages, and thought that the best way to deal with them would be to let them have their way so long as they did not attempt any personal indignities. In a short time they swarmed into the house, breaking everything breakable, and the mother saw her most valuable articles, nearly all of which had been brought from the old homestead in Holland, demolished and the floor strewn with the fragments. In vain did the girls try to save from destruction a handsome mirror. In response to their pleadings the savages led in a colt from the family stables and compelled it to walk over the glass, wrecking it completely, after which they placed the frame around the animal's neck.

There was one article which Betty Van Alstine was guarding with watchful eye. This was a new hat which her father had brought her from Philadelphia, and being a present, it was highly prized. At the first alarm she had placed it in a basket which she had secreted in the darkest recesses of the closet in hopes that it might escape the Indians' eyes.

But alas! for Betty's care, the red searchers espied the closet, and in a moment the basket was brought forth and the young warrior was making off with the trophy when the patriot girl bounded after him and seized her property.

"You can't have my things!" exclaimed Betty, as the Indian turned to resent the interference, and then a sharp struggle ensued, which was watched with delight by the other marauders, who left their work of plunder and gathered round the pair.

Betty Van Alstine was a stout girl, used to the hard knocks of border life, and the warrior soon discovered that he had no mean antagonist. He was forced to relinquish his hold on the basket, which Betty did not give up for a moment, and all at once he found himself sprawling on the ground, having been pushed down by the determined girl, who bore her hat off in triumph to the shouts of the red spectators.

Having regained possession of her property, Miss Van Alstine ran off and threw it into a pile of hemp, and when her pursuer, the young warrior, came up she reappeared, ready to renew her defence of the hat. But, abashed by the shouts of derision from his companions, the Mohawk withdrew from the contest, and Betty was left in possession of the prize of battle.

She stood guard over the hemp pile until the Indians went away, after destroying everything but the house itself, and when the young warrior looked back he saw her waving at him the one object which, above all others, he wanted as a trophy of the descent upon the house of the "Brave White Squaw," a name which Mrs. Van Alstine had already earned. From that eventful day Betty's hat enjoyed a notoriety it had not had before, and it is said that long afterwards—when the colonies had secured their independence and when Betty had a little household of her own—a Mohawk Indian came to her home and laughingly recalled the gallant defense of the "Philadelphia bonnet." Strange to say, he was the same warrior who had tried to carry it off the day the band plundered her mother's house.

But the historic Mohawk valley did not furnish the only girl patriot of the revolution. There is an old saying that Gen Greene "exchanged his northern laurels for southern willows." It is true that he met with many reverses during his famous campaigns in the Carolinas, and more than once was compelled to flee from a victorious foe; but these defeats do not detract from his greatness.

During one of his retreats, when he had Lord Rawdon at his heels, as it were: Gen. Greene was desirous of sending a message to Gen. Sumter the "gamecock of the revolution," who was then on the Wateree with his detachment. Greene was anxious to form a junction with Sumter believing that, combined, the American forces might fall upon Rawdon with success as he had devided his army and seemed to offer himself as an easy prey.

In vain did Greene look for some one to carry the message. The country between him and Sumter was full of tories who never neglected an opportunity to shed the blood of whigs, as the patriots were termed. The bravest men in the neighborhood shrank from carrying the dispatch, and Greene was despairing when a young girl presented herself at his headquarters.

"I hear that you want to send a message to Gen. Sumter," said the beautiful stranger. "I will take it to him. My name is Emily Geiger and I want to do something for my country."

The pariot general was thunderstruck, but at the same time he hailed her proposition with unbounded delight.

"I know the country through which I will have to pass," continued Emily, "and if you will trust me with the message, I promise to place it in Sumter's hands."

Accordingly Gen. Greene wrote a letter which he gave the fearless girl, at the same time telling her its contents, which she was to communicate verbally to Sumter in case of accidents; and with the paper carefully concealed, Emily Geiger mounted her horse and rode away. She had embarked on a dangerous journey, but this did not deter her. Her way led through some unbroken country and over ground infested by British and tories, and on the second day she was halted by some of Lord Rawdon's scouts, who refused to believe her artfully-contrived answers, and conducted her into their camp.

Confronted by the new danger, Emily Geiger's daring did not desert her. She recalled Gen. Greene's instructions, and when she had been placed in a room there to remain until she could be searched by one of her own sex, she made up her mind what she would do. A tory had been dispatched for the woman who was to search the suspected girl, and before he had returned with her Emily ate up Greene's written instructions to Sumter, piece by piece. It was her only hope to escape punishment, if not death, and at the same time keep Greene's designs from becoming known to the enemy.

When the tory woman arrived, Emily was carefully searched, but nothing damaging was found on her person, and as she refused to disclose the secret she was suspected of having in her possession, the tories were compelled to set her at liberty. Even then she was released under protest, and when she rode off was secretly followed; but taking a roundabout route she deceived her foes, and soon afterward galloped into Sumter's camp, much to the surprise and delight of that officer.

One of the historians of the revolution has truly said that "the salvation of the army was due more than once to the watchfulness and tact of woman," and we have thought to rescue from the annuls of that trying period the names of two of its young heroines—Betty Van Alstine and Emily Geiger.

She Would Talk.

New York Tribune.

A new story is told about the sharpness and briskness of the captains of the trans-atlantic steamships. On a recent voyage of one of the well known vessels plying between here and Europe, one of the passengers, a woman, pestered the captain to death with unnecessary questions. Some heavy weather set in, and owing to the fog and rain the ship's officers were unable to make their usual observations. When the captain came down to dinner on that afternoon his persecutor was waiting for him.

"Rough weather, captain," she said.

"Somewhat."

"A good deal of rain."

"A good deal."

"Pretty heavy fog."

"Yes, it is."

"So heavy, I understand, that you could not make your observation."

THE TWO MURDERS.

A Rhode Island soldier had returned to Virginia after being mustered out of service, and had invested some money in lands. Near Charleston, West Virginia, lived a young lady with whom this Rhode Islander, Stephen Chase by name, fell in love. The girl had two or three other admirers, and there was more or less hard feeling between the men. On one occasion, when all met at the house, there were some hot words between Chase and a young man named Talbot. There would have been a fight but for the girl's interference. On the following Wednesday Chase started out for Charleston on horseback to again visit the girl. This was the last seen of him alive. It was nearly a week before his body was found in a thicket ten rods off the road.

It had been robbed of all personal property, and coat, vest, and shoes were missing. For two or three days I believed the object of the murderer was robbery. Then I learned what had passed between Chase and Talbot, and I had another clew to work on. I found two men who had seen Talbot near the spot where the murder was committed, and at about the hour. I found others who had seen in his possession a large roll of bills. There were yet others who said he told contradictory stories. The young lady was a powerful witness against Talbot. On the evening of the murder he had come to the house in an excited state of mind. He looked pale and there was a fresh cut on his cheek, which he said he got by a fall. He was ill at ease when he arose to go and said:

"People about here suppose me to be poor, but I am not. I saved several thousand dollars during the war, and can keep a wife in luxury."

He exhibited the roll of bills to her, and she laughingly admitted that he was a good catch. Inside of a week I had sufficient evidence to warrant his arrest.

"What am I charged with?" he asked.

"Murder."

"Good God! But who—who——"

"The murder of Nathan Chase."

"But when—where?"

"On the afternoon of the 15th. You know where the body was found."

"And you say I killed Chase?"

"That's the charge."

"Thank heaven! I'll go with you willingly. I had no more to do with his death than you."

He was loged in jail, and everbody believed him guilty. He had no parents, and was about 25 years old. When arrested he had over $2,000 in greenbacks on his person. Chase was known to have had about this sum with him. When questioned about this money by his friends, he could make on satisfactory answer. He finally claimed to have found it on the highway.

When his case came to trial we had nothing but circumstantial evidence, but were well satisfied with that. What could be stronger? Known to be jealous of Chase and his enemy; seen near the spot, suddenly possessed of considerable wealth; taking no part in the search; stealing away from Charlston to let the matter blow over; furnishing every proof in his demeanor that he is guilty refusing to accouut for his time on the day of murder; giving no satisfactory account of the money in his possession. Further than this I had discovered that he spent nearly all day in the woods, and that on his return to town his clothing was torn and muddy. There was just one point in the case where we were lame. Chase weighed 180 pounds, and Talbot was a dapper little fellow who didn't balance quite 128. He had no more muscle than a woman, and the question was how he got the body from the road to the thicket. There had been rain the day before, and the ground was soft. We found the prints of feet, and these were two large for Talbot. We could not find that the body had been carried in there on the saddle, neither had it been dragged over the earth. It was a question that vexed me many days and nights, and the only way that I could satisfy myself was by supposing that Talbot had a confederate. All things considered, this did not seem likely. And again I remembered his words and conduct when arrested. He was terrified when charged with murder, but as soon as I said it was the murder of Nathan Chase he exhibited instant and great relief. There was something queer about that, and it bothered me.

The young man claimed that he found the money, and that he spent the day in the woods. Further he could not or would not go. Previous good reputation was, of course, urged in defense, but the lawyer might as well have kept silent. The jury was out only fifteen minutes, and when a verdict of guilty was rendered the judge sentenced the prisoner to be hanged. The day of execution was set about eight weeks ahead. It was as plain as day that the verdict and sentence were stunning surprises to Talbot, though expected by every one else. A guilty man could not have counterfeited his amazement. He acted as one just aroused from sleep. I had worked up the case for the state conscientiously, and with a feeling that Talbot was a red-handed murderer. He had no sooner been convicted than I began to doubt his guilt. His lawyer and his uncle also had their doubts, and only two or three days after the sentence I began to investigate on the other side.

Having gone on the theory that Talbot was guilty, all other clews had been left unworked. I first began inquiries as to who might have been in the neighborhood that day. After considerable time I found that a houseboat, in which were several colored men, had tied up to the bank of the Kanawha the day before Chase was shot, and left the evening of the tragedy.

In a fight on board a colored boy about 19 years old had been shot in the knee and flung overboard. He was rescued by a passing skiff, and was still on his back. I ascertained his name, learned that he was cool and close mouthed, and then I went to see him. As I learned over his cot I said:

"Sam, I have bagged the whole crowd, and got most of the money. They are going to swear the murder onto you."

"Swar it onto me!" he exclaimed, rousing up in an instant. "Why, sir, I didn't eben dun know about it till arter we had shoved off."

"How much money did you get?"

"Not a 2-bit piece, sah. Ole Peter an' dat man Huckins dun said dey would keep it all deirselvels. Dat's what de row was about."

I had found who killed Chase. I followed down the river after the houseboat, but heard of it at Parkersburg, only to lose it forever. It had been run down by a steamer in the night, and all the crew were drowned. Sam, however, was the only witness needed on the stand.

I was now sure that Talbot did not murder Chase. Then where and how did he get that money, where was he on the day of the murder, and what crime had he committed to betray such signs of guilt? I set out one day over the road where he had been seen. I entered the woods, beat them up for two miles on each side of the road, and was about giving up the search when my dog made a discovery. In a thicket to the left of a hog path which led off the highway, and on broken and stony ground, I found a lot of human bones. They had been somewhat pulled about, but the skeleton of a man was there, and the iron frame of a sachel was close at hand.

Who was the man? No one was missing. No one had gone out from the hotel and failed to return. Whether this poor fellow was going into Charleston or leaving it could not be told. It might have been that Talbot decoyed him out there on pretense of selling him land, or he might have accidentally met him. The prisoner awaiting execution showed by his demeanor that he was the murderer of the man whose bones I had found, but he would not let fall a word of admission. I had worked up evidence to prove him guilty of a murder he did not commit, and for a murder he was really and truly guilty of I could furnish no proof whatever. The governor had to interfere, and the courts had to set him at liberty.

A Game Coon.

Every coon hunter in Ansonia and Birmingham has been baffled by one old coon, and its pluck, courage and abilities as a fighter had won for it the respect of every true sportsman in the two towns. Recently two Seymour men, V. H. McEwen and D. W. Lewis, having read of the wonderful prowess of a certain cornstealer, started out to find it. It was very late at night when they got to the tree where the coon made its home, but they had read that it could whip any dog of twice its weight, and they wanted to see it done. One of them fired and the coon came down. It landed on top of their dog and the fight began. The hunters stood looking on for a few minutes until the dog showed signs of exhaustion, when they tried to club the victor. They couldn't hit very hard for fear of hurting the dog, and they didn't dare shoot. In a few minutes the coon had the dog by the nose and had dragged him into a shallow pond near by. In a short time it would have drowned the dog had not the hunters rushed into the water and dragged them both out, dispatching the coon with clubs. The animal lacked only a few ounces of weighing 25 pounds. It was placed on exhibition at Ansonia, and on Saturday night it was roasted and served to a few invited guests. It was the biggest as well as the boldest coon in western Connecticut.

John Is "On."

A few days ago a lady in the city, fond of collecting curious, went up to the store of a well-known and unusually intelligent Chinese merchant. She carefully examined the various importations from the Flowery Kingdom until she found a little vase that pleased her fancy.

"How much is it?" she asked of the proprietor.

"One dollar six bittee."

"Isn't that very high?"

Wanted Some Store Teeth.

The other day a woman not over 30, but minus her teeth, called on a prominent dentist, and asked him if he could not rent her a set of teeth to wear to a party that evening. She told the dentist that she supposed that false teeth were kept in stock and that people fitted themselves.—Waterbury American.

Read Before Signing.

Among the pithy sayings of a well-known German philosspher and reader occurs the following: "Sign no paper without reading it." In these days of education, enlightenment and progress, such a caution would hardly seem necessary to any person in the full possession of his faculties; yet it is astonishing how many people there are, including good business men, who attach their signatures to papers or documents whose contents may have a serious bearing upon themselves or their affairs, with scarcely a glance at their contents. Carelessness in failing to acquaint themselves with the contents of a paper before signing it has worked incalculable harm to thousands of well-intentioned people. It is a good thing, therefore, to bear in mind continuously the above quotation, particularly with respect to such papers as express or imply anything in the nature of a contract or a legal obligation.

"Not by a long chalk!" said the orator, "There's none of it here. It's all in the other party! Chuck the traitor out!"

And he was thrown out.—Boston Traveler.

Came Back For Revenge.

Kansas City Star: One day while proceeding up a canon in the Raton Mountains a large silver-tip bear and her cub leaped out and made a rush up the sloping side of the valley. There were three in our party, and every Winchester began to talk very earnestly and excitedly. The cub tumbled dead the first fire. I call him a cub, but the truth is he was more than half as big as his mother, and weighed 240 pounds. The old lady did not show any injury, and the moment the young one tumbled she turned and came back square in the teeth of the rifles, and, seizing her dead cub in her teeth as a cat does a kitten, raised it fairly clear of the ground and cantered up the hill—no easy matter, as, aside from the 240 pounds of limp and dragging weight, she had to force her anxious, loving way through oak brush, which in many instances, might have detained a steer. She got fairly away, albeit we fired several shots after the cub fell.

We had just reloaded the magazines of our Winchesters and were communing as to taking the trail of the old bear, which showed wide and clear in broken bushes and disturbed oak leaves and pine needles, when looking up we beheld our game coming straight back for us. She meant business, too. Her red and streaming tongue lolled out of her half-open mouth, and her eyes partially closed in rage, would have seemed quizzical in expression were it not for the ferocity which leaped and flashed in their depths like sheet lightning behind some cloud screen. She came straight to us, and we settled her troubles at the first fire. We found the cub up on the divide, She had carried it at least sixty rods, with two bullet holes in her shaggy hide as we found when we skinned her.

"Annie My Poor Annie!"

He was old and seedy, says the Detroit Sun, and had evidently been a rounder for many years. Too frequent imbibations of booze had finally knocked him off his feet, and he gradually deteriorated in social quality until he finally became a tramp. His nose was red; his eyes bleary and watery, his voice was husky, and was propelled toward the public by a breath that was strong in its odoriferousness; his hat was but a remnant, not worth mentioning: his faded, beer-stained graybeard had not been shoved in out of public gaze by a barber for days, and his frowsy hair sadly needed amputation; and from his coat tail protruded the traditional oyster can.

He shambled into Verner's saloon at a gait that was half shuffle and half stagger.

"Gim me er drink. I want a drink," he remarked piteously, as he put his dirty trembling paw on the bar. "Hurry up, I jes' seen Annie; ain't got no money, but must have er drink, for I jes' met Annie."

"Who is Annie?" inquired the bartender, as he handed over the bottle.

"Annie! Annie" uttered the tramp in a sad and reflective tone of voice, as though he was ruminating on happy bygone times, "Annie, Annie, my dear, dear, Annie."

The bartender looked compassionate and as a tear rose to his eye he forgot to notice that the sorrowful tramp had hit the bottle three times.

"My boy," he exclaimed, as he wiped off his chin and went toward the door, "my poor Annie is any body what I kin work the sympenthetic racket on fer a drink es I have you!"

He vanished through the door just in time to avoid being hit with a club.

Little Love Lost.

"Dearly beloved, our parting does not seem hard to me for three reasons—you do not love me, you do not love each other and the Lord does not love you. If you loved me you would have paid me for my services during the past two years. You do not love each other, otherwise I should have more marriages to celebrate, and the Lord does not love you, for otherwise he would call more of you to him, and I should have more funeral services to conduct."

THE MASTER BUILDER.

Yet builds exceedingly strong;
Each seeming, inconsequent trivial part
Is tried with the test of a master's art;
With the delicate touch of an artist's hand
The lightest and tiniest grain of sand
Is arranged in its place in that edifice grand
Whose architect never goes wrong.

The Truth is a builder that few may know,
The work is so wondrously still:
Noiselessly, ceaselessly delving the earth,
Selecting, inspecting each object of worth.
Exploring the depths of the sea and the air
Or the realms of the infinite everywhere.
Treasure of value beyond compare.
Is gathered with consumate skill.

Yet the edifice stands for aye;
When glittering records of warrior's deeds,
Bewildering rules of philosophers' creeds,
The dogmas of schools and political schemes,
Fanatical follies, enthusiasts' dreams,
And all of the rubbish with which the world teems,
As stubble has vanished away.

The Truth is a builder that few may know,
And yet all the world may see;
For tribute is levied at every one's door,
The weak and the humble each add to the store,
And in that great future how great the surprise
If we, as the shadows escape from our eyes,
Find the simple have often done more than the wise.
In building that home for the free.

SEIZING A SMUGGLER.

THE life of a preventive officer is not always one of pleasurable excitement, as the following story, obtained from an officer of the Dominion preventive force, will testify: Ours is not always a bed of roses—began the officer in question, in relating his story—and any one who joins the force under the impression that it is will be sorely disappointed before he has put in six months' service, especially along the coast of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I had a rather exciting experience of it a little time since with a notorious gang of smugglers on the east coast of Novia Scotia. I had been made aware of the fact that a small schooner of about sixty tons had left for the French island of St. Pierre Mignelon, one of those French islands lying off the south coast of Newfoundland, a noted rendezvous for smugglers, and knowing the character of the captain and crew, there was little room left for doubting that they meant business, and would return with a good supply of French wines and liquors to smuggle in along the coast. I was also pretty well satisfied of the point at which they would attempt to affect a landing, and accordingly lay waiting the arrival of the suspected craft.

I knew I had a pretty good job cut out for me, but determined to go into it single handed. I had lain in ambush about twenty-four hours, when at midnight I heard a boat pulling toward the shore from a vessel which soon came in sight and dropped anchor about one hundred yards from the wharf, under the cover of which I concealed myself. The boat's crew, four in number, landed, and after satisfying themselves that the coast was clear, and leaving one of their number on shore to reconnoiter, returned to the vessel to commence landing their contraband cargo.

The time had now arrived for me to commence operations, which I must admit, in view of the great odds against me, I did not do without some doubt as to my personal safety. I was well armed, however, and had been in some pretty tough places before, and did not feel disposed to show the white feather just now, probably stimulated to the effort by the knowledge that the prize before me would be a valuable one if I secured it.

As I left my hiding place to take a boat I had observed tied to a stake on the shore about 100 feet from me, with a view to reaching the craft before any portion of the cargo could possibly be landed, I noticed a burly looking sailor approach and get into her and start for the schooner. I hailed him and asked him to take me off to the vessel. To this he paid no attention until I drew my revolver, under the cover of which he returned and took me in. I saw that, if possible, he would upset the boat and dump me into the Atlantic, which, I determined, if possible, to prevent. He began to pull for the vessel, and laying all his strength on one of the oars, succeeded, as he had at first intended, in breaking it. I seized the other, and at the same time dealt him a blow which laid him flat in the bottom of the boat, and then paddled for all I was worth for the schooner.

It being dark the crew supposed I was one of their own gang who had been left on shore, and did not oppose my boarding the vessel. When they saw the trap they had fallen into, however, there was a general uproar, and had it not been for the interference of the captain I would certainly have been thrown overboard.

I looked about the vessel and found that preparations had already been made to land the cargo before daylight. The boat had been loaded down to the gunwale and was about to start for shore when I stepped on deck.

"Well," asked the captain, "what do you propose doing?"

I informed him that the vessel was now under seizure, and that nothing should be landed until I had received my instructions from Ottawa.

Here I was, alone on board a piratical vessel, with six about as tough looking cut throats as one will meet within a day's journey through the slums of any large city, and twenty miles from the nearest point from which I could hope to obtain any assistance, as I was right in the heart of one of the worst smuggling districts on the Atlantic coast.

"Well," said the captain, "as the schooner is now in your possession, I suppose you will have no objection to our pulling her into the wharf and making her easy?" To which I assented.

The casks and cases which had been stowed in the boat were again placed on deck, and a line was run to the shore by which the vessel was warped alongside the wharf and made fast. The captain and crew then jumped ashore and left me in full possession without saying a word.

They had not been gone twenty minutes when it suddenly dawned upon me that the captain had not taken the seizure of his vessel so quietly for nothing, There was something up, and if an attempt was to be made to recapture the craft alongside the wharf was not the place for me to attempt to defend my prize. I accordingly cut the stern and bow lines by which she was held, and allowed her to drop off into the stream. When about fifty yards from the shore I let go the anchor, and awaited developments.

By this time it was daylight and looking toward the shore I saw a gang of about a dozen men, one of whom carried a shotgun, coming down towards the warf, where they had expected to board her without any any difficulty. I had forgotten to mention that when I first stepped on the vessel's deck I had shown my badge, and at the same time my revolver, which I said I would use upon the first man who attempted to disturb the cargo or laid a hand upon me. It was quite evident that there were no firearms aboard the vessel at the time, or matters might not have gone as smoothly with me. The only way the vessel could be boarded was from a boat, and this gave me an opportunity of holding the fort, which I would not have had had the schooner been tied up alongside of the warf.

When the smugglers and their pals had reached the wharf they sat up a shout, calling upon me to come ashore in the boat which lay alongside the vessel, to which I, of course, paid no attention. The boat in which I had made my trip to the schooner lay on the shore, and in a few minutes I saw that an attempt was going to be made to board the vessel in the stream. The boat was boarded and shoved off toward the schooner. I stood by to prevent a landing on the deck being effected, and as the first man placed his hands on the rails to jump on board I drew my revolver and cocked it in his face, threatening to shoot if he did not drop back into his boat.

Looking up suddenly I saw a cut throat looking ruffian drawing a bead on me with a shotgun from the stern of the boat, while a dozen pirates called to him to shoot, and I think the command would have been carried out had not one of the crew knocked the gun out of his hand into the water, remarking at the same time that "we will all be hanged if you shoot him."

I can tell you I felt a little easier when I saw that gun drop overboard. But there I was, one against twelve, and I did not know how many more recruits would arrive when word of the seizure reached along the hostile shore. I had now been thirty-six hours without sleep, and only a cracker or two to eat, which I had fortunately put away in my pocket. I could not leave the side of the vessel for one moment, and I did not know how long that state of things would last. The nearest point from where I could get assistance was twenty miles distant. To attempt to hold the vessel against such odds with no prospect of help reaching me was ridiculous, as I must give in in the end, so I determined to make the best escape I could.

The boat's crew, seeing that I meant business, and that any one who attempted to board the vessel took his life in his own hands, after hanging around for an hour or so, pulled for the shore to renew their attack in another way. Immediately on landing they arrayed themselves along in line, and commenced a fusilade of rocks upon the vessel, smashing skylight and everything breakable about the deck. I dare not leave the deck for fear that a second attempt at boarding would be made, and to protect myself from the torrent of stones which were flying about my head I was obliged to take up a position behind one of the masts, against which I had to stand in an upright position for over an hour, as by this time re-enforcement had arrived, and I can assure you they made it pretty lively for me for a while. After a time, tired beyond endurance, I managed to get hold of the mainpeak halyards and raise the gaff of the mainsail a few feet above the deck, which gave me a first rate shelter from the shower of rocks which was still falling upon the deck on all sides.

I now began to think of what was best to be done. If I surrendered now the chances were that I would not get away alive or at any rate would receive a rough handling. I must manage to escape unknown to the crowd on shore, and this could only be done after nightfall. If I escape by the boat which lay alongside, and pull along the shore, to the nearest settlement without their discovering I had left the vessel for some time, I would have a chance of getting assistance and be able to return and secure the schooner, possibly before they had time to unload her, and certainly before they could get away from the port. Upon this I decided, and laid my plans accordingly.

In the first place, I must cripple the vessel as far as possible, to prevent her being taken away immediately. I found a monkey wrench in the cabin, and set to work to detach her steering gear. I managed to get the wheel off, which I threw over board, and dislocated the rest of the apparatus, so as to render it completely unserviceable for a little while at least. Either the strength or stock of rock ammunition of my assailants had become exhausted, and for a while there was a suspension of hostilities. Of this lull I took advantage and wrecked in every possible way tackle and rigging, so that if after I left the craft an attempt was made to run her out to sea it could not be accomplished without considerable delay.

After I had carried my work of destruction to a point when I thought it ceased to be further necessary in the eyes of the law I began to think of my departure, which must be commenced as early after darkness closed down as possible. I got everything ready, oars muffled, and a lantern hung upon deck, that they might be more likely to think I was keeping watch after I had left the schooner. Before stepping from the deck into the boat I fired two shots from my revolver into the air, to let them see I was still alive, and then quietly shoved off from the side of the vessel farthest from the shore, and commenced my pull along the coast toward the nearest house, which I knew to be about five miles distant. I arrived there, and at once making known my mission secured a horse and buggy and drove with all possible haste to the nearest town, about fifteen miles distant, where I knew there was a tugboat to be obtained.

I was not long in securing the services of this craft, and the assistance of four well armed men, whom I knew I could rely upon in case we had to fight. The tug was soon puffing her way toward the point where I had left the schooner, which we reached the following morning about daylight. As we steamed around the point we could see that the smugglers had taken possession of the vessel and were landing the cargo upon the beach. Running up alongside we made fast and jumped on board. The captain and his gang commenced to show fight, but the sight of our revolvers, five of them drawn in battle array, quieted the fighting propensities of the pirates, who, however, when they saw us manning the windlass to raise anchor, were disposed to resist, but concluded not to.

As we tripped the anchor the captain, who still remained on board with six or seven of his crew, asked us if we were not going to put him on shore, to which I replied no—that we intended taking them around with us, prisoners.

By this time the tugboat was puffing away ahead of us, when suddenly we heard a splash, and looking around we saw the captain and his crew swimming for the shore for dear life. From this out we were unmolested, and, after a few hour's sail, I had my hardly earned prize safely srcured at the wharf beyond the reach of the pirate captain and her piratical crew, with the "queen's broad arrow" fastened to her mast.

Timber 4,000 Years Old,

Probably the oldest timber in the world which has been subjected to the use of man is found in the ancient temple of Egypt, in connection with stone-work which is known to be at least four thousand years old. This was the only wood used in the contruction of the temple, and is in the form of ties, holding the end of one stone to another. When two blocks were laid in place an excavation about an inch deep was made in each block in which one of these wooden ties, shaped like an hour-glass, was driven. It is, therefore, very difficult to force a stone from its position. These ancient ties are made of timarisk or shittim wood, the same as that from which the ark was constructed.—St. Louis Republic.

A Cool Thief,

A thief went through the Mount Vernon, O., Sanitarium the other day. He drove up to the door of the building in a buggy, hitched his horse, and went in. Soon after a lady patient entered her room and found a man there with a two foot rule measuring a window. Turning to her he said: "There seems to be only one slat broken out of that blind, and I've only found four so far in the house." He then went out and went through the other rooms, and, having completed his researches, got into his buggy and drove away. Soon after the lady who saw him in her room found that her purse, with $17, was missing, and an investigation proved that the thief had ransacked all the rooms right before the eyes of the manager and all of his assistants.—Cleveland Leader.

The Law Is No Good,

The Ohio law which demands that all executions be conducted in prison and between midnight and daylight was intended to suppress newspaper particulars; but in this it is a grand failure. Full particulars are always to be obtained by a hustler. If there be any cruelty in hanging a murderer it is certainly cruel to rouse him up at midnight to walk to his death.

"You must be identified," brusquely exclaimed a San Francisco bank cashier the other day to a tall, hook-nosed woman in green, red and blue, who brought in a check at a time his window was crowded. "Well, I—I—why—I—no, it cayn't be! Yes, it is, too. Ain't you Henry Smyth?" "That's my name, madam," he replied coldly. "An' you don't know me, Hen? I'm changed some, an' so air you; but I jist knowed I'd seen ye. You've got that same old cast in your left eye, your nose crooks a little to the left. an' you're a Smyth all over. An' you don't know me! Don't know Salindy Spratt that you useter coax to become Salindy Smyth. 'Member how you useter haul me to school on your sled an' kiss me in the lane 'an call me your little true love? 'Member how you cut up 'cause I gave you the mitten? Land, Hen, I could stand here all day talkin' over them old times! You kin i-dentify me now, can't you, Hen?" "Hen" did so, but in a mood that almost produced apoplexy."

JAS. MEEHAN, JR. Editor and Prop.

If the Sioux were compelled to live on farms they would no doubt ask Uncle Sam to furnish white man to work their land.

The alliance, after shaking the solid North, are endeavoring to break the Solid South. This is ingratitude to the democracy of Minnesota.

It is not expected the force bill will pass the senate or ever become a law. If it does the gallant sons of the south will be prepared to perform the last duty—to die nobly.

We admonish the people who are opposing on equitable terms, a division of Polk county to pause in their course before they have driven a large body of the high minded and loyal tax-payers to a state bordering on desperation.

Sitting Bull is no more. The Messiah did not make him bullet proof. The Indian police are a brave body of men, not only on the Sioux reservation but wherever found. Those who are the cause of the death of Sitting Bull should be pensioned.

"Issues change, parties must change with them," is the subject Thomas Wilson will dwell upon at the Reform Club feast Dec. 30. If the Minnesota statesman doesn't make a break about railroads and corporations, the democracy of gopherdom will be proud of their fallen chief.

It is not a thirst for conquest but a firm resolve to demand our personal rights that has induced the people of Red Lake Falls and vicinity to ask for county division, and that upon fair and equitable grounds. We make no exorbitant, no unfair or unreasonable demands; all we ask is what is due a large number of the taxpayers of the northern and eastern part of the present county. We want no territory that belongs to any other of the cities or villages that aspire to be a county seat. A different temper from this would put us on opposing grounds with our neighbors. This will be our last resor,t but if we must resort to these means the war will be carried into state legislature and thence back home to the firesides of the farmers. Should we longer shrink from a vindication of our personal rights we might readily be classed as sheep ready to be devoured by the wolves around us. We have all been educated in the great doctrine of equal rights, this is all we ask. When we desire to have the county divided and a county seat at Red Lake Falls—if we cannot have these rights by a request or demand, it is time for us to buckle on our armor and go forth to war do battle. It is better for us to be brought home dead upon our shields than submit and freeze in a blizzard attempting to get to the present county seat.

The civil service law seems to be something useless. No matter how honestly a party complies with it, there is always a certain element of the party who have been disappointed because they, through compliance with the law, have been shelved or rejected, and although these are the chronic office seekers, they are still the element that holds the balance of power, and from this element comes the defeat of whatever party is in power. Aiding this element are those who have from the start been opposed to the law; who believe to the victors belong the spoils. This class has no use for the "mugwump" and believe only the true men of the party should be placed with the official reins in their hands. When the democrats were in power they managed to avoid the requirements of the law by what they termed "offensive partisanship," and with this two-edged sword succeeded in decapitating most of the republicans whose claims to office was almost of a hereditary nature. But had Cleveland and his advisers not endeavored to win over republicans by a deceptive move which had for its object a desire to convince lovers of civil service reform that he was living up to the law by keeping a few of the republican officers still in charge, he might now be warming his shins at the presidential stove. His apparent love of civil service reform made democrats discard him to the extent that the great pivotal states were lost to him. What the democrats and republicans want written in their political skies is "I am a democrat" and "I am a republican. Then will they march forward to battle with this sign upon their banner. It was Cleveland's mistakes that induced Hill to say, "I am a democrat." There are a great many holdovers in the service to-day who have outlived their usefulness, and too many men have been appointed with a narrow conception of public duties—bigots by creed or sect—these kind of officers will not do in free America and unless the present administration makes some amends for the mistakes they have made in appointments this will be as great a source of loss to them in the East as the McKinley bill is in the West. Whether it is best to disregard the civil service law and allow a battle to be waged for the spoils alone is a question which if answered in the affirmative might leave our institutions in danger of destruction. Let the future care for itself. At present our country is safe.

Where There Is No Putrefaction.

Dr. Regnard has raised the question in one of the medical journals as to whether a corpse which sinks to a very great depth is preserved indefinitely or otherwise from putrefaction. According to his researches, which have been published at some length in the archives of the Biological society of Paris, putrefaction is not found to take place in decomposable substances submitted to a pressure of 600 or 700 atmospheres, these figures corresponding to a depth of 6,000 or 7,000 meters at sea. From these experiments it must be concluded, according to Dr. Regnard, that there is a total absence of putrefaction in the greater depths of the sea.

Long Lived Overalls.

The story is told of a man who works on the water power who has worn the same pair of overalls for twenty-six years. It was only a few days ago that he was obliged to throw away his old pair and buy a new pair. The old ones were originally blue drilling, but they had been patched so many times that it was at last impossible to determine their composition.—Biddeford Journal.

M. Janssen from observations taken at the summit of Mont Blanc concludes that there is no oxygen as we know it in the photosphere, and that as oxygen would tend to combine with hydrogen and cut off our supply of heat by absorption, it is satisfactory to know that the sun is still far from that stage in its process of cooling.

In England the badger—a somewhat different animal from the American badger, though like him in many respects—is still hunted by gentlemen by way of "sport." Dogs are especially trained to hunt badgers, and the sport has the peculiarity that it must be enjoyed at night. Between 11 at night and 2 in the morning, when the badger sallies forth from his hole in pursuit of his game, the sportsmen go in pursuit of him.

Default having been made in the conditions of a certain mortgage containing a power of sale dated April 5th, 1887, duly recorded in the office of register of deeds of Polk county, Minnesota, on April 8th, 1887, in book 30 of mortgages on page 338 whereby Wilfred Cyr and Emma Cyr, his wife, mortgagors, mortgaged to F. T. Day, mortgagee, the west half (w½) of the south east quarter (se¼) and the south east quarter (se¼) of the south west quarter (sw¼) and lots nine (9) and ten (10) all in section twenty-five (25) in township one hundred and fifty one (151) of range forty-five (45) in Polk county, Minnesota containing one hundred and seventy-four and 25-100 acres, by which default the power of sale has become operative and no action or proceeding at law or otherwise has been instituted to recover the debt remaining secured by said mortgage or any part thereof and there is claimed to be due on said mortgage at the date of this notice, the sum of $87.30.

Notice of Mortgage Foreclosure.

Default has been made in the conditions of a certain mortgage, and in the payment of the debt secured thereby, which said mortgage bears date July 31st 1882, and on said date was duly executed and delivered by Samuel Meunir, mortgagor, to the Colonial and United States Mortgage Co., (Limited) mortgagors, a corporation duly organized, and authorized to transact business in Minnesota, and which said mortgage was duly recorded in the office of register of deeds in and for the county of Polk, Minnesota, on the 31st day of July, A. D. 1882 at 4:45 o'clock p. m. in book "G" of mortgages, on pages 508, 509 and 510. That thereafter, to-wit: On the 16th day of August, 1887, said mortgage, for value received, sold and duly assigned said mortgage to Albert W. Knaak, by an instrument in writing duly executed and delivered on said date, which said assignment was duly recorded in the register of deeds office in said Polk county, Minnesota, on the 5th day of September, 1887, at 11 o'clock a.m., in book 32 of mortgages, on page 410.

And whereas, there is now claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon said mortgage and the debt secured thereby, the amount of four hundred and seventy-six dollars, together with the additional amount of seventy-two dollars, paid by said asignee for taxes on the premises described in said mortgage, and interest on the taxes so paid, which amount is also claimed as a lien on said premises and secured by said mortgage and no action or proceeding at law or otherwise has been had or instituted to recover the debts secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale in said mortgage contained, and therewith recorded, which by reason of the default above mentioned, has become operative, and of the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the land and premises described in and covered by said mortgage, to-wit:

The fractional north-west quarter (¼) of section number three (3), being the south half of said northwest quarter (nw¼) and lots numbered three (three) and four (4), government subdivisions of said section three, (3) in township number one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range number forty-two (42) west, containing one hundred and fifty nine 16-100 acres, and situated in the county of Polk and state of Minnesota, will be sold at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage and debt secured thereby, taxes and interest, together with all foreclosure expenses and lawful disbursements including twenty-five dollars attorney's fees, stipulated to be paid in said mortgage in case of foreclosure thereof, which sale will be made by the sheriff of Polk county or his deputy, at the front door of the First National bank in the village of Red Lake Falls in said county of Polk, Minnesota, on Saturday, the 31st day of January, 1891, at 2 o'clock in the forenoon of that day.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

The Choral society meet at Marshall's Monday night.

Pierre Lawrence was married to Miss Box at Tacoma last week.

The death of David Paul at Duluth, of Typhoid fever is announced this morning.

The county commissioners will meet on the 2rd and write their political anti-mortem statements.

Rufus Poirier's call was especially pleasant to day as he deposited cash for two years' subscription.

The date for the election of officers of the First National Bank is Jan. 13th instead of the 12th, as it appeared last week.

H. C. Hanson, who formerly supplied our citizens with milk ond moved to West Superior last fall, died last week of typhoid fever.

Farmers are making hay from the fields where the tall grass waves. We may soon have occasion to talk about our banana crop.

Rev Thos. Douglas of Langdon Dak. came down Friday night. He held services in the Presbyterian church Sunday morning and evening.

The public schools will close for two weeks over the holidays, the vacation beginning Monday, the 22d and continuing till Monday, the 6th of Jan. 1891.

41 W. T. SPILLANE.

August Riechel Jr. was about town Saturday for the first time in three months. Mr. Riechel's friends give him a hearty welcome back to the ranks of the well.

Crookston's senatorial argument got a bad scorching Tuesday morning—in other words fire came near destroying the McKinnon block. Luckily not much damage was done.

Joseph Smith was at Crookston Monday. He was routed out of bed at five by the sounds of the fire bell. Nothing like living in a city where such disagreeable passes never occur.

Mat Skala hasn't the rheumatism in his shoulder but his right arm is somewnat used up from hand-shaking all on account of a bright little boy that made his apperance last Saturday. Congratulation.

Hon. William Haynes, the genial and talented professor of Law in the University of Notre Dame, Indiana, made us a very pleasant call when in the city last Saturday. Prof. Haynes is a gentleman whom it is a pleasure to meet. In him are combined the qualities of the refined editor, the polished lawyer, the eminent educator, in whom Notre Dame has reason to feel proud.

Six farmers from Wisconsin in the vicinity of Green Bay will settle on the north side of the river. We understand one of the party has negotiated for the purchase of Mat Coad's two farms and two more quarter sections adjoining. The land has sufficient pasturage to enable them to keep one hundred cows, which they will bring with them. A creamery will be built in the spring. These men have recently disposed of their farms in Wisconsin, and each bring from two to eight thousand dollars with him.

If the parties who stole the Editor's ducks will please release what they now have on hand we will forgive them for the two they ate on thanksgiving day. A man who is cold blooded enough to steal ducks from an Editor and say his wife bought them up north will, we predict, never be a shining star in the firmament of eternity, we furthermore predict, he will be shoveling coal where they dont shovel snow.

Mr. Frank Kratka and Mine Host Robecke, of the "Ogemah," all of Thief River Falls, were here Tuesday getting a breath of metropolitan air. They report fifteen lots being sold Monday for a good round consideration. The people of Thief River Falls are in need of a railroad and the Great Northern, only six miles away, has not shown a spirit of justice nor enterprise in its determination to keep out of the town as long as possible. Outside realestate owners residing in St. Paul and Minneapolis are negotiating with the Northern Pacific and it is almost certain that road will build to Red Lake Rapids in the spring.

Prof. Wm. Haynes of Notre Dame, Indiana, and Hon. A. H. Mahone, of Charleston, West Va., were in the city Saturday. They are a commission appointed to negotiate with the Turtle Mountain Indians with a view of moving and settling the Turtle Mountainers upon land to be purchased from the Red Lake band. When here the commission were unable to decide if an agreement could be made with the Red Lake Indians or whether the removal of the Turtle Mountain band could be effected. It is more than likely the Red Lake Indians will be averse to allowing any other tribe to come within the territory defined by the last treaty, and the work of the commission will undoubtedly be postponed until next spring.

There are always those to be found in every community who are ready and willing to support a one horse snide show, furnish it with a building and patronize it. These floating institutions are no benefit to a town, they only work in a dishonorable opposition to our regularly established merchants. The business men who support them are those who have descended to the lower rungs of the ladder. If you are running a newspaper and the business men don't advertise, bear patiently with them, don't seek revenge by upholding a transitory mercantile show that comes to-day, stays a week or so and then tells the people they are selling out at cost for the purpose of catching whatever small change belongs to the regularly established merchants. We say sit down upon the traveling Isaacs whether they be Scotch, Irish, Dutch, French, American or Hindoo.

The dime sociable at J. D. Marshall's Friday night proved a very pleasant affair. A large attendance, and all present seemed to enjoy themselves heartily. Social games, vocal and instrumental music, together with "fifteen minutes for refreshments," made up a program that gave to the wings of the evening the speed of a dove. Mr. and Mrs. Marshall proved the most delightful of entertainers. The proceeds were enhanced by the auctioning of three cakes at the hands of Jas. I. Wyer. Mr. Wyer was found to be an excellent auctioneer; so efficacious, indeed, that he succeeded in selling one cake twice. An object of general admiration was the flowering Chinese Chrysanthemum sent by Mrs. Dr. Watson to represent her that evening. The huge, low drooping branches excited the admiration of all present. The proceeds of the sociable were put into the hands of the committee arranging the Presbyterian Christmas celebration.

Last night "Gosselin Hall" presented an an animated appearance. An oyster supper was being served and partaken of and an evening of general amusement instituted, while the silk quilt hung prominently there, waiting to be raffled. The occasion proved one of exceptional success. Over one hundred persons partook of supper, the proceeds amounting to $30.10. During the evening those present were favored by a serenade from the band, well rendered and received, and by vocal selections from Mrs. W. A. Schreiter, Mrs. P. G. Falardeau, Mrs. J. D. Marshall, Messrs. L. A. Kaufer, H. A. McClatchie, Phil. A Kaufer, and Theodore Majeres. These are all well known local lights and need no introduction. About 9:30 the raffling begun and all attention centered on this point. Mr. J. Marshall received the little slips of paper that were to decide the ownership of the quilt, from the hands of two little girls, Lucile Falardeau and Josie Kaus. It was some time before the announcement came "208—Quilt." No one present claimed the ticket. Reference to the books showed that Matthew Coad, Esq., was the lucky man. General exclamations, frowns, laughter, and the large assemblage broke up, leaving naught but a haunting stillness to keep company with HoppingSam, the lone Chinaman below. The ladies had sold 400 tickets. This brings the net proceeds of the quilt to $115, (pretty good for a maniac quilt) and the ladies are excessively happy.

Charles Langevin is at West Superior visiting.

A New Institution.

BASED UPON ALLIANCE PRINCIPLES.

Emissaries were out among the farmers Sunday in the interest of a corporation founded in Red Lake Falls. The object being to secure subscription to capital stock and start an alliance store in this place. Three hundred were asked to take as many shares, valued at $10.00 each. To the stockholders goods will be sold at cost and an assessment will be made regularly to meet expenses. It will be a general store, and will no doubt ruin all the other business establishments of the place. It is not known as yet what success the committee of solicitors had, but particulars will be given later.

Wheat Thieves.

Deputy Sheriff Mead and Marshal Hennemuth have been gone since last Friday in pursuit of the thieves who stole Wm. Zaiser's wheat. They returned home yesterday but the birds had escaped them and had flown perhaps into the Clearwater pineries. The officers traced them to a station near Crookston where the wheat was disposed of to Wm. Dargan. With Mr. Dargan's assistance they were tracked to Crookston. One of them was driving the team when the city marshal or chief of police attempted to arrest him, taking hold of the lines, saying at the same time, "I arrest you." Judging from subsequent events it was only the team he arrested as the nimble thief rolled off the other side of the wagon and disappeared in the alley. Officers Mead and Hennemuth followed them to Fosston where they gave up the chase.

St. Mary's Church.

Christmas day will be celebrated in St. Mary's church in a due manner. Elaborate and profuse decorations will fill the interior of the church, making realistic to young and old the great feast of Christmas.

The choir will give its sweetest strains of music. The music will embrace selections from Mozart, Farmer, and other known composers. A beautiful English Christmas anthem for six voices will open the solemn service at 5 o'clock Christmas morning, followed by highmass and sermon. At 10:30 a. m. the first service will be repeated.

To gladden the hearts of the little ones the ladies of the parish have made up a large Christmas tree, laden with more than two hundred presents to be distributed on Christmas day at 7:30 in the evening. All the children of this vicinity irrespective of denomination, are cordially invited to gather around the tree and receive their respective prizes.

Visitors at any of the services will be provided with seats.

St. Joseph's Basaar.

The fair for the benefit of St. Joseph's church will open Tuesday, the 30th day of December, and continue the two following days. The fair will be held in the opera house. Everyone conversant with the financial condition of St. Joseph's parish will be ready and willing to lend aid, that she may be relieved from the burden of debt under which she is laboring. She is making a noble effort. If success crowns her work our village will soon be graced by new spires rising to the skies, an emblem of advancement and unity.

There is no doubt that the bazaar will be a grand affair. We have the list of a few of the contests to be made, which will add zest and spirit as well as revenue, to the fair:

Revs. Ig. Balluff, of this place, and Wm Guillaume, of Lambert, will be contestants for a gold-headed cane.

Peter Morisette and Frank Tessier will run for a fine gold watch.

Two little girls, Ida Verboncouer and Celestine Labissoniere, will contest for a dress.

An elaborate doll baby will be awarded to the most popular elderly lady.

All charitably disposed people are most earnestly invited to attend.

Look Here.

The ladies committee on the St. Joseph church fair met to-day, Dec. 18th and elected Mrs. George Marchildon president vice Mrs. P. D. Couture, resigned. It was decided to hold the fair at Kretzschmar hall on Dec. 30th, 31st and Jan. 1st, 1891

Died,

Yesterday Mrs. Therese Buse, wife of Mr. Ernest Buse, of this city, died at her home on Burard street. Mrs. Buse was highly esteemed by a large circle of friends who will lament her decease while yet young and will sympatyize with the bereaved husband.

The above is taken from the Vancouver Daily News-Advertiser of the 28th inst. It is indeed a startling announcement to the many friends of the family here. Mrs. Buse was but 34 years old. Mr. Buse is left with a family of eight children.

County Division.

It is seldom as much enthusiasm is manifested at a public meeting as at that held in the council rooms Tuesday night, called for the purpose of discussing ways and means whereby Polk county should be divided. About seventy farmers, all alliance men, were present and mingled harmoniously with the town people. Each took a deep interest in the proceedings, feeling their work would result to their own benefit. A committee, consisting of Joseph Smith, F. E. Hunt and J. T. Knight, was appointed to confer with Crookston and Fosston people relative to adopting conciliatory lines for the new counties. This committee will visit Crookston next Monday and Fosston Tuesday.

Happy New Year.

Yes we hope it will be a Happy New Year to all—and certainly there can be only good in good wishes. The year of Grace, 1890, is almost gone. Like all else in human life, it has been rather "mixed." Sometimes we "caught on," and everything "came our way." On other occaisions we bet our money on wrong hoeses and were sadly left. Sometimes wa have had lots of fun and at other times we hane found this to be a "hard and cruel world." We have made some new friends and lost some old ones. We made lots of hay, but our potatoes were few in a hill. and small at that. If we should strike a balance, we should find that on the whole we are considerably ahead—more sweet than bitter. For itself, "The Burlington" has done pretty well this year, thank you, an rejoyces in the acquaintance of many new patrons, while the old ones are still with us. Thankful for the past, we are yet more hopeful for the future—and in the future when traveling by rail, take "The Only." SITTING BULL DEAD.

FORT YATES, S. D., Special Telegram, Dec. 17.—Sitting Bull was arrested this morning at daylight by the Indian police. Friends attempted his rescue and a fight ensued. Sitting Bull, his son Black Bird, Catch Bear and four other hostiles, together with seven of the best police under Capt. Fecht, were killed.

As soon as the firing had ceased three troops of cavalry came to the rescue of the Indian police, who were being routed by the skilled sharpshooters of the hostiles.

They brought with them two machine guns, which were turned loose upon Sitting Bull's followers, and within five minutes the savages were out of range and leaving at a furious rate on their fleet ponies toward the Bad Lands, where Short Bull and Crow Dog are intrenched with 200 Ogallala bucks.

The police were sent out to Sitting Bull's camp to arrest the old medicine man, as it had been reported that he had struck his tepees and was about to join the hostiles, who have pillaged along the White river. When the officers reached the camp they found Indians ready to march. Their ponies were painted and many of the savages had stripped themselves for war. The police made a dash into the camp and seized Sitting Bull.

They were on their way back to Standing Rock when Black Bird, the tall and athletic son of the famous chief, urged his comrades to recapture the old man. The women and children were left in the bushes and then with yells the hostiles charged upon the police, firing as they came. A hand-to-hand struggle ensued, during which Sitting Bull, who was not shackled, gave his orders in a loud voice.

For several minutes the firing was heavy and deadly. Nearly every man who was hit was killed. In the furious fusillade Sitting Bull fell out of his saddle, pierced by a bullet, but it is not known whether it was fired by the charging party or one of the police. Black Bird was also slain almost at the first volley of the police. The hostiles fired with deadly accuracy, and slowly drove the officers from the field.

If the cavalry had not come at this time it is probable that the force would have been annihilated. The soldiers were quick to enter into the action. A skirmish line was thrown out and then, kneeling and firing as they advanced, the gallant troopers, with the machine guns playing over their heads, poured a withering fire into the savages.

Sitting Bull's body, which had been abandoned by the police, was recaptured, as well as that of his son, and will be taken to Standing Rock. After the fight was over the followers of the dead chief struck out at a killing pace for the Bad Lands.

The battle to-day, news of which is still meager, will doubtless inflame the entire Sioux nation. There has been no report from Pine Ridge since yesterday, but it is certain that if Gen. Brooke sent his troopers out to the White river, as he promised twenty-four hours ago, he, too, has also had a fight by this time.

SAVED BY CAVALRY.

The Police Run Out of Ammunition During the Fight.

BISMARCK, N. D. Special Telegram, Dec. 17.—It is almost impossible to obtain reliable information of the affair at the Standing Rock agency this forenoon, as the government telegraph is under such strict surveillance that no private or press messages will be transmitted after office hours, and not even then unless approved by the military authorities.

It appears that the arrest had been made by the police, who started with Sitting Bull for the agency, when about a hundred of the hostiles attacked them and attempted to rescue their leader.

The cavalry were about three miles behind, and a courier was dispatched to them for assistance. The troops hastened forward and arrived just in time to prevent a wholesale massacre of the police, who were entirely out of ammunition when the soldiers arrived.

Too much praise cannot be given the faithful native police for their bravery and loyalty, several of them giving up their lives rather than be false to their trust.

It is believed that the death of Sitting Bull will be the end of the trouble at Standing Rock, although his followers, having tasted of bloodshed, will perhaps require energetic and severe treatment for a while.

The military is at last awake to the gravity of the situation, and the result will no doubt be the complete disarmament of the disloyal redskins.

AFTER THE INDIANS.

Gen. Ruger on the Trail of the Indians in the Bad Lands.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 17.—Gen. Schofield this afternoon received two telegrams from Gen. Ruger, commanding the department of Dakota, in one of which he says he hopes to get in all the Indians who turned back from the Bad Lands. Two Strikes' party is trying to induce them to come along with them. He says that the Indians are moving slowly on account of poor stock.

The other telegram includes a dispatch received yesterday from the commanding officer at Oelrichs, S. D., saying that his interpreters just in from White River report that fifty lodges in the Bad Lands are trying to work their way north to the Cheyenne river agency. Gen. Ruger adds that the necessary steps have been taken to intercept them if possible.

Gen. Schofield received a telegram to-day from Gen. Miles confirming the press reports of dissension among the Indians on the Bad Lands. As no report has been received in regard to the reported engagement between troops and Indians, it is not believed that such a thing occurred.

FUN AHEAD.

Buffalo Bill Notified That the Campaign Will Open To-Day.

LA CROSSE, Special Telegram, Dec. 17.—Dr. D. F. Powell received the following dispatch to-day:

"Tell Pepaska (Buffalo Bill) Gen. Carr in field with Sixth cavalry. Campaign opens to-morrow. Is he coming?

JOHN M. BURKE."

Maj. Burke is Cody's manager, and has charge of the Wild West Indians. Cody is going to his home in Nebraska to-morrow, and being somewhat out of health will not go to the frontier unless the troops of his state are called out.

FIGHT WITH INDIANS.

Five Redskins Killed by Citizens Near Battle Creek, S. D.

CHICAGO, Dec. 17.—A dispatch received at army headquarters from Battle Creek, S. D., states that a letter had just been received by a courier from Capt. Wells. at the south of French creek. stating that a fight had occurred there Dec. 12 between twenty citizens and a band of roaming Sioux. Five Indians were reported killed, but the loss of the whites was not given.

A dispatch from Gen. Brooke said that reports received by him on the night of the 13th showed a decidedly hostile intent on the part of the Indians in the Bad Lands. He feared that the collision between some citizens and the Indians had turned the scale.

Information from Fort Bennett goes to show that the Indians at Cherry Creek agency are greatly excited, and that under the leadership of Big Foot they are keeping up the ghost dances. The Indian excitement is increased by the report that bands of Sioux from Rosebud and Pine Ridge are moving in the direction of Cherry Creek.

Col. Corbin said last night that it was not known whether or not the fight referred to by Gen. Brooke was the one that occurred at French Creek.

"If not," continued the colonel, "there have been two rows, and of the one referred to by Gen. Brooke we know nothing as yet. It is to be feared, now that blood has been shed, that there will be more trouble. for if an Indian knows that some of his tribe have been hurt he will forego his peaceful intentions. Two Strike was on his way into Pine Ridge, and it is to be hoped that he won't turn back when he hears of the French Creek affair. In all probability Kicking Bear and Short Bull are the instigators of such trouble as has occurred."

THIRTEEN CASUALTIES.

The Official Report of the Affair Sent From St. Paul.

CHICAGO, Dec. 17.—At 9 o'clock to-night Assistant Adjt. Gen. Corbin, of Gen. Miles' staff, received an official dispatch from St. Paul saying Sitting Bull, five of Sitting Bull's men, and seven of the Indian police have been killed. The thirteen casualties were the result of an attempt by the police to arrest Sitting Bull.

Gen. Brooke, in command of the troops at Pine Ridge, telegraphed the situation to Assistant Adjt. Gen. Corbin at army headquarters to-night as follows: "All the Indians who can be brought in are now here or near here, leaving about 200 bucks in the Bad Lands who refuse to listen to any one or anything. Against these I will send a sufficient force to capture or fight them. All has been done that can be done. The Indians now out have a great many stolen horses and cattle with them. I hope to be able to end this matter now."

GIVING CHASE.

Troops After the Fugitives From Sitting Bull's Camp.

DICKINSON, N. D., Special Telegram, Dec. 17.—Reliable dispatches received here this evening state that Sitting Bull's camp was attacked by troops, and himself and seven warriors killed.

The remainder of the band are now in retreat up the Grand river, and it is not yet known definitely along which fork their trail will lie.

Information of the most reliable nature was received to-day that a band of eight wagons were encamped on the Little Missouri, opposite Pretty Buttes. It is therefore probable that the fugitives will make this camp their objective point. They will not be able, without great exertion, to reach the forks of Grand river to-day. It is estimated that 150 warriors are in the band, and this number is likely to be increased by other bands.

TWO STRIKES GIVES IN.

PINE RIDGE AGENCY, S. D., Dec. 17.—The troops did not start this morning, as Two Strike sent word that he was coming in as fast as possible. The old warrior is now camped at the Catholic mission ann will be here by noon to-morrow. He has 180 lodges or about 920 Indians, principally old men, women and children. The cavalry and artillery are all ready to start at sunrise.

CHIPPEWA FALLS, Wis., Dec. 17.—Peter St George of Cadott early Sunday morning reported that his wife was missing. Search was instituted and she was found in the woodshed hanging by the neck and stiff and cold. Certain contusions and wounds about her face and head indicated foul play and the husband was at once suspected as the murderer. He was watched throughout the day by the authorities, and at 10 o'clock at night, when the coroner's jury reported that Mrs. St. George's death was due to murder by unknown hands, went to the house to arrest him but found that he had committed suicide by cutting his throat. Domestic difficulties are alleged as the cause for the tragedies.

Mr. Frye said that the pending bill was not one-tenth part stringent enough—not one-tenth part drastic enough in its provisions. If, in order to secure the right of the American citizen to freely cast his ballot and have it counted as cast, it was necessary to put a bayonet behind every ballot, he would put a bayonet behind it. [Mingled applause and hisses in the galleries, which was promptly suppressed by the vice president.]

HOUSE.

The fortification bill was passed, together with a bill appropriating $400,000 to meet a deficiency in the appropriation for printing and binding. In the committee of the whole the house considered, without action, a bill to amend the anti-polygamy law by providing that the personal property formerly belonging to the Mormon church, but which was forfeited by congress and placed in the hands of a receiver, shall be placed in the common school fund of the territory of Utah; also, the bill to indemnify the purchasers of swamp land and to reimburse the several states for lands due them under the swamp lands act.

The resolution was amended so as to call for reports as to the works in each state separately, North and South Dakota, Colorado. Kansas and Nebraska. and then it was passed. Every Republican senator except Hale favored it. The outcome is very satisfactory to the senators from the states interested, who believe it was a sign that the Republican majority looks at the irrigation problem in a way that means good to the west.

Senator Power introduced a bill to create two aditional land offices in Montana. Dillon and Fort Benton are to be the sites for the land offices.

Quinn, in charge of the government improvements on the lakes and rivers in the Duluth district, to New Orleans, where he will have charge of the engineers' work in the Seventh and Eighth lighthouse districts. Lieut. Graham D. Fitch will temporarily have charge of the work at Duluth. As soon, however, as Maj. Quinn assumes charge of his new work Capt. Walter L. Fisk, now in Louisiana, will go to Duluth. Chaplain William Larkin has been ordered to report to Gen. Ruger at St. Paul for examination by a retiring board of which Gen. Ruger is president.

The jury in the Peter Orth case at St. Cloud, which was to recover the sum of $30,000 from the Great Northern for personal damages, returned a verdict of $15,000 for the plaintiff. The case will be appealed.

John Schieb, a farmer of Lone Tree township, Chippewa county, while driving home from Willmar fell out of the wagon and sustained injury to his spine from which he died soon afterward. He leaves a wife and three small children.

B. C. Bartlet, of Hinckley, has two perfectly white fawns, captured a few weeks ago. The little deer are very beautiful, having light colored eyes and toes. An effort was made to capture the mother, a pure white doe, but she managed to escape.

The safe in the Northern Pacific station at Clitherall, near Fergus Falls, was robbed of $750. It is supposed that an operator named Nichols, who was temporarily in charge, took the money, as he has disappeared.

H. S. Branham, mayor of Litchfield, while delirious with fever, got hold of a revolver and shot himself through the head, inflicting a fatal wound. He had been sick but a few days. Mr. Branham was one of the leading business men of Litchfield and was well known throughout the state.

At Bluffton, on the Northern Pacific, William O'Regan, a traveling peddler, single, was standing near the station holding his horses by the head while a train passed. The horses became unmanageable and ran upon the platform, throwing O'Regan under the train. The cars passed over him, killing him instantly. The coroner's jury exonerated the railroad company. O'Regan is supposed to have friends near Morris.

Jacob Frey, a butcher of Fergus Falls, tried to throw a quarter of beef over a beam and when he slipped from the step-ladder he fell on one of the sharp hooks used in the meat market to hang up beef. The hook caught him under the ear, inflicting a terrible gash. The flesh pulled off, and he fell to the next hook below, where he caught by his shoulder and hung until lifted off. The injuries are severe, but he will recover.

A quiet wedding occurred at St. Margaret's chapel, Westminster, London, England. The contracting parties were Gertrude L. Archibald and Joel P. Heatwole, both of Northfield. Cannon Farrar and Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, performed the ceremony. The bride was given away by Mr. White, of the American legislation. After the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. Heatwole left for Paris and will visit other points on the continent, returning to Northfield some time in January.

E. E. Carson, a patient in the Rochester insane asylum, the other day succeded in unlocking a window screen, and tying his bed-clothes together he knotted one end to the steam heater and attempted to slide from the window to the ground. He had just started, however, when his rope untied and he fell to the ground, four stories below, striking on his feet. He was heard to fall by parties on the outside and was taken into the asylum. A terrible shaking up appears to be the only injury he sustained.

NORTH DAKOTA.

There are four cases of scarlet fever at Bismarck, but efforts are being made to prevent the spread of the disease.

The president has approved the joint resolution authorizing the secretary of war to issue, 1,000 stands off arms to each of the States of North and South Dakota, Wyoming, Montana and Nebraska.

During the absence of her husband Mrs. Geo. E. Wentworth, of Bismarck, attempted to feed the family horse, and fell from the hay loft to the manger, striking her back violently and receiving internal injuries that will confine her to her room for some time.

Two men, charged with larceny and confined in the Fargo lock-up, made their escape from that institution. No trace of them has yet been found. They had been discharged from jail but a short time ago because witnesses against them had disappeared.

Representative Hansbrough introduced a joint resolution in Congress appropriating $500,000 to be expended under the direction of the agricultural department in the purchase of speed wheat for the residents of this state who lost their crop by reason of drouth or through other causes during the season of 1890.

Andrew Lee, is a well-to-do farmer living fifteen miles south of Grand Forks, and the last seen of him alive was about 7 o'clock near the hotel at which he stopped. Next morning his lifeless body was found one mile from the city near the Great Northern railroad track. From the appearance of the body it is believed that Lee was murdered and his body placed near the track to avoid suspicion.

Senator Pierce has made another move to secure an appropriation to repair Fort Abraham Lincoln in this state. He introduced a bill which contemplates a much greater improvement than the one before the senate at the last session. The amount asked has been increased from $15,000 to $200,000. The need of quarters for troops in that particular spot just now will help toward favorable action on the bill.

Grand Forks Herald says Edward Campbell, charged with burglarizing Brooks Bros. elevator at Ojata, was acquitted, but was immediately re-arrested at the instance of the American Express company charged with robbing a safe at Fort Abercrombie. The two men charged with robbing Tharaldson's store pleaded guilty and were sentenced by Judge Templeton as follows: Ward, three years and nine months; Kingsberry three years and nine months.

A new chapter in the pardoning of Billy Oswald, who was sentenced to the penitentiary at Bismarck for twelve years for killing Pat McWeeney in 1886, was developed in the district court at Devil's Lake in the case of E. E. Dow of Grand Forks vs. Elliott. Elliott who was foreman of the jury that convicted Oswald, testified that he received $50 at the hands of Col. Lounsberry in consideration of which he (Elliott) signed the petition for a pardon.

P. B. Groat, general emigration agent of the Northern Pacific railroad, returned to St. Paul from a two weeks trip through the state. He reports that the outcome of the crops this year is generally from fairly good to good, except in the extreme southern part of the state and in some comparatively small districts in the central counties. The prices of grains range high, and farmers are, as a rule, getting in good shape financially.

For two days the attention of the district court, at Fargo has been occupied with the Traill county seat case. At the present election a vote was taken upon the re-location of the county seat, and it was largely in favor of moving it from Caledonia to Hillsboro. Suit has since been brought to prevent the removal on the ground that the act under which the election was held was unconstitutional, it being special legislation which the constitution prohibits. The judge has reserved his decision.

President Stockbridge, of the State Agricultural College, at Fargo, announces a winter course of instruction open to all farmers and young men desiring instruction, beginning January 3, and continuing twelve weeks. To distribute the advantages as equally as possible, a scholarship, entitling the holder to free tuition and free room rent is placed at the disposal of each member of the legislature, and one for each local grange, alliance or farmers' club within the State. Board for each student can be had at three dollars per week, and for others an extra charge of from one to three dollars per week will cover the expense of rooms. "The course, though conducted on a scientific basis, will be made preeminently practical, the end constantly in view to impart to students in attendance such positive practical information as will find constant application on the farm, and enabling its possessor to conduct his affairs more understandingly and successfully."

SOUTH DAKOTA.

A petition is before the Sioux Falls city council to have the parade of the Salvation army abated.

The farm house of Elias Holderman, near Gettysburg, was recently destroyed by fire, together with nearly everything it contained.

Deputy Sheriff Kittrell went into a saloon in Hill City to stop a row, when he was set upon and battered up in bad shape. The whole outfit was arrested the next day.

John Clodfelter is under arrest at Mitchell for receiving a bribe. In the Brokaw contest case he swore he had received money on election day by which his vote was influenced.

Brown county during the last year has furnished 1,000 tons of free coal to people unable to buy it. The prospects are that a still larger amount will be supplied during the year to come.

Mrs. C. H. Wood, who recently suicided at Madison, left an infant son only a few months old. The child was taken to the home of its father's parents in Burlington, Wis., but only survived its mother a week.

There are one or two men traveling through the state selling evergreen trees for which the victim agrees to pay $10 per 1,000, and the note turns up in some bank to be a $100 note.

Fred Clyne, proprietor of the railroad boarding house at Fantail Gulch, recently packed his trunk and skipped out, leaving his wife behind. He took along with him all the ready cash, leaving his wife only the household effects.

John A. Burns, who ran for sheriff on the independent ticket in Douglas, took his defeat to heart and to get even he quietly packed his goods, got a couple of his neighbors to haul them to Delmont, and left the country. Some of his creditors got onto the racket, however, and went to Delmont and attached the goods.

A short time ago a Sioux Falls family received a box of clothing from friends in another state, and just ten days from the receipt of that box, two cases of malignant scarlet fever broke out. It has since been learned that four years ago there was a case of scarlet fever in the family of the sender. The clothing had been in a trunk for four years and the germs of the disease retained their fatal power during that time.

WISCONSIN.

C. J. W. Argrelius was held for trial at Madison for horse-stealing. He is thought to be the leader of an organized gang of robbers.

There was a mock marriage at Superior the other day, but the principals are a little worried because they are told that the ceremony "goes."

Waukesha people were gulled $100 worth by a representative of the "World's Fair Journal," with a circulation of 30,000. The paper is a myth and so is the agent.

W. K. Armitage, of the town of Pine Valley, Clark county, the past season harvested 1,000 bushels of corn, from six and one-half acres of ground, by actual measurement.

The report is current in Appleton that two Lawerence University students settled a love dispute in a duel with boxing gloves. Denials are now in order.

William Murray, accused at Superior of missappropriating other people's money during the night time, waived examination and was held in $1,000 bonds for trial.

Sometimes streaks of bad luck and good luck follow each other in quick succession. The other day a Walworth County man fell from the roof and broke his leg, and the day following his wife applied for a divorce.

Robbers at Wonewoc the other day made a haul that they had not banked on. They raided Henry Kittleson's granary and stole a quantity of barley. Kittleson had $740 stowed away in a bin and they took it along.

The sad news of United States Marshal George F. Ginty's death at Madison, was received in Chippewa Falls with profound sorrow. The remains were taken to that city in a special car. The funeral was in charge of the Grand Army Post.

South Superior is growing rapidly. The present population is estimated at 1,200. The manufacturing companies now there are able to support a population of over 4,000. By the first of January the Webster Manufacturing Company will have a large force of skilled men at work.

Evan Coolidge, the Waupaca banker who was arrested on a charge of securing a deposit while knowing his bank was insolvent, is under $300 bail. The punishment for the offense named, on conviction, is not less than one year nor more than ten years imprisonment, or by fine up to $10,000.

A small party of Pottawotomie Indians killed thirty deer in the Pattern Lake district, in Florence county, during the past three or four weeks. The settlers justly complain against the government's action in permitting the redskins to leave their reservation for the purpose of slaughtering deer upon lands owned by private parties.

IOWA.

The Clinton Age complains that a justice of the peace in that city has been drunk for two days in succession.

Burglars broke into the postoffice at Kanoka the other night and carried away $400 in money and stamps belonging to the government.

The samples of sugar beets grown near Perry were tested the other day, and one was found to contain 25 and the other 20 per cent. of saccharine matter.

A committee was appointed by the Iowa State Board of Health to investigate an alleged case of leprosy in Storey county. If it was an actual case, great care should be taken by the authorities.

A young girl named Brooks, living near Ontario, Boone county, while alone in the house with the younger children fell down the cellar way and broke her back. It took some time to procure a doctor, and the girl suffered terrible agony, being unable to move until help arrived. She may recover.

A stranger in a "long ulster and with his hat pulled down over his eyes" accosted James Spragg on one of the streets of Ottumwa the other night and ordered him to "stand and deliver." Spragg stood and delivered two or three shots from a self-cocking revolver, but the footpad managed to escape to a place of safety to nurse his wounds.

A truly remarkable natural curiosity is to be seen near Holstein, Ida county. A few months ago a well was bored to a considerable depth in search of water. The search was unsuccessful and when the tools were removed a stream of damp, cold air was emitted from the hole, having a pressure of about fifty pounds to the inch, and which has continued to pour out ever since. The explanation given is that an immense cavity exists somewhere below the surface of the earth, sinking to it forces the air up through the outlet formed by the well.

A somewhat remarkable story comes from Mt. Pleasant. It is related by the News of that city and is as follows: A monster North American eagle alighted down on one of L. J. Carron's sheep the other day and slew it. Mr. Carron frightened the bird away before it had time to appease its appetite, and, thinking it would return to finish its repast, salted and peppered the carcass with strychnine. His engleship returned, as was expected, and filled himself with the mutton. He was seen to fly to the top of a giant oak by Mr. Carron and Lew Goe, who happened to be there for a load of wood. The old national bird soon began to sway back and forth on his perch, and after a few minutes fell to the ground a dying bird.

Cowardly Sitting Bull.

"Sitting Bull is the rankest coward that ever bedaubed his ugly face with paint," remarked Gen. Wesley Merritt in the course of an interview. "His name has been so closely coupled with the Custer massacre that the general public picture the old villain at the head of a howling band of savages, his feathers flying in the air and his eyes flashing with the fire of battle as he leads his reckless hordes of painted warriors into the very teeth of leaden death. Very poetical, but the truth is that while Custer's brave band of 300 men were being mowed down by nearly 10 times that number of well-armed Indians, taking several lives for each one they give up, fighting against hopless odds and realizing that they could expect no quarter, the old squaw man, Sitting Bull, sat in a tepee out of the range of bullets and stirred a boiling pot of herbs, over which he repeated wild and unintelligible incantations. A courier brought word that Custer was driving the Indians back, and the old coward who gained so much notoriety from the Custer massacre precipitately fled, accompanied by the squaws and pappooses, to a point where stray bullets could not possibly reach. For his rank cowardice at the Custer fight Sitting Bull lost his influence with the tribe over which he ruled, and it is only of late that he has regained it. He is a villainous old rascal, but as a warrior he is no good at all. He is known at home as the 'squaw man with much talk.'"

He Spheres,

Persiflage in the Void: "I'm no coward," said the earth.

"No; but you have two great fears," observed the Sun hotly.

"And they?"

"The hemisphere's."

"You've forgotten the atmosphere." put in the Moon. And the Comet wagged his tail with joy.—Herald.

This gossip must have been overheard while "the morning stars were singing together for joy."

SINGLE TAX DEPARTMENT.

TAXING LAND VALUES.

[Henry George, in N. Y. Standard.]

The substitution of taxation upon the single item of land values for all the various taxes now imposed would be an enormous governmental and social economy. We should save the salaries and perquisites and official expenses of the horde of functionaries, national, State and municipal, who are now engaged in assessing and collecting all these other taxes, or in doing things directly or indirectly necessitated by the cumbrous system. We should get rid of them all, from those fee-paid local officials who in a single term expect a fortune, and those federal collectors whose places are deemed of more importance than the governorship of sovereign States, down to the officials who are busied in seeing whether cigar boxes are stamped and peddlers are provided with licenses, or in searching the trunks and persons of passengers as they land. We should save the cost of trying and imprisoning offenders; we should save, too, the cost of all the devices—some of them very expensive—that are resorted to for evading the revenue laws, for it is obvious that all these expenses must ultimately be borne by consumers.

The tax upon land values is of all taxes that which combines the maximum of certainty with the maximum of expense. "Land lies out of doors;" it can not be hid or disguised, and its value is easily ascertained. Any competent real estate dealer can tell to a nicety the value per front foot of any lot on Broadway. But, to ascertain the value of the building on it, it will be necessary to get an expert to make an examination; while, if that building be filled with goods, it is impossible for any outsider to get at their value. A tax upon the value of land can be collected to the last cent by a tax collector sitting in his office. Deducting the very small percentage, which would be all that would be required to pay the expenses of the periodical assessment and the receipt of taxes, the people in their collective capacity would thus get the benefit of all that was paid in as taxes by the people as individuals.

But the saving that would result is by no means to be estimated by the reduction in the cost and direct incidents of collecting revenues. It is the great vice of taxes that distribute themselves in added prices that, beyond the official tax gatherers, they create a long line of virtual tax gatherers, and that each man in the line not only takes the tax, but his profit on the tax, and in many cases is enable to take a great deal more. How strongly the "whisky ring" opposed the reduction of the whisky tax and the match manufacturers the abolition of the tax on matches is well known. And so with all indirect taxes. The difficulty is not usually in imposing them, but in abolishing them. Let a bill be introduced in Congress to abolish the tax on any of the long list of things taxed, and strightway there will appear in the lobby some one to protest and log-roll against it, a sure proof that somebody besides the Government is making money from the tax—that is to say, that the tax is taking from the people at large a good deal more than the Government is getting from it. That this system, which engages great private interests in keeping up rather than in putting down taxation, fosters governmental extravagance and corruption is clear.

Now, by abolishing all other taxes in favor of the tax upon land values we should not only save very largely in the ways thus pointed out, but by the greater simplicity that would be given to government, we should save the political demoralization which the present system entails. It is "the money in politics" that makes our politics so corrupt, that puts honesty and patriotism at a disadvantage, and gives us traders and jobbers where we ought to have statesmen. That there is so much money in politics arises principally from the great number of officers which our present system of taxation necessitates, and from the great number of pecuniary interests which it concerns in the running of government. And beyond all this is the effect upon morals. Nearly all the taxes which we propose to abolish become, in one way or another, taxes upon conscience, and by setting a premium on bribery, forgery and fraud, foster political corruption and social demoralization.

Now, in view of the great economies which in all these various ways would result from the substitution of a tax on land values for all other taxes, is it not clear that the change would be of the greatest benefit, and would conduce largely to the general prosperity. Beside such "civil service reform" as this, the little picayune measure, good though it may be in itself, on which men like George William Curtis have been spending so much time and talent, is as a minnow to a whale.

The present System, which taxes buildings and improvements, capital in all its forms, and in most of our States in all its shadows, is a system of direct discouragement to production, a system which fines the man who creates wealth just in proportion as he creates wealth. Instead of acting on the principle that the man who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before is a public benefactor, our system of taxation treats him as a public enemy. If a man clothe a barren waste with grain and fruit trees, if he drain a swamp or open a mine, if he put up a house where none stood before, or erect a factory, or turn wood or iron into a ship; if he get him a library with which to store and exercise his mind, or a telescope with which to sweep the heavens, or laboratory in which to seek out the laws of nature's combinations; if out of his savings he lay by a provision for his declining days; if by his energy and thrift he accumulate capital with which to assist and organize and provide the tools for industry—down comes the tax gatherer to make him pay for having done these things! Is not this as absurd as it is unjust? Is it not in direct contravention of the plainest dictates of enlightened public policy? Do we not all want more wealth? Why, then, should we tax and fine the production of wealth?

Some of the Southern States have recently passed laws exempting cotton manufactories from taxation for a term of years, and the result has been the erection of a number of cotton factories, for the capitalists who thus invest their money can calculate on dividing as profits what otherwise they would have had to pay as taxes. Are not these States wise in this? Do not these cotton factories create new industries, add to the wealth of the neighborhoods in which they are erected, and enrich the whole State? But if this be wise, would it not be still wiser to make the exemption permanent instead of for a term of years? And, if it be wise to exempt cotton factories, would it not be wiser still to exempt all sorts of factories, all forms of capital, all kinds of wealth—houses and goods, horses and cattle, railroads and telegraphs? Is not the State the richest that has the most of these things?

Why, then, should the State tax them? Is not the stupid system that does tax them too absurd for any rational defense? The people of New York want cheaper house rents. Is it not stupid, then, to put taxes on buildings, which necessarily will diminish the erection of buildings, and, unlike the tax on land values, must inevitably be collected from tenants in higher rents?

But the direct obstacles to production, which this system imposes, are not the worst. All the indirect taxes which pass from hand to hand, increasing the cost of commodities, are taxes against production, which increase as they go. This barbarous tariff of ours, that raises an artificial barrier around our coasts is more difficult for commerce to surmount than would be the Andes or the Himalayas, takes from the people much more than is received by the Government, and, by its action and reaction on prices, hampers every exertion of industry, from the building of a railroad to the shingling of a woodshed or the making of a shirt.

Now, it is clear that to abolish all the taxes that thus hamper industry, would be to vastly stimulate production and increase the general wealth. But this is only one side of it. To put taxation on the value of land would also be to remove obstacles to production. For the speculative value, which now attaches to land as soon as it becomes probable that it will be needed for use is a direct check to production. To get the vacant lot on which to put up a house, even on the outskirts of any one of our large cities costs as much as or more than ordinarily does the house. Before he can strike a plowshare into virgin soil, the farmer, unless he will go far beyond where his labor can be exerted to most advantage, is obliged to pay down a large part of his capital, to embarrass himself with a mortgage, or to agree to give up a large share of his produce as rent. The result is to fill the land with tramps; to crowd our centers even in the best of times with men who are willing to work, anxious to work, but unable to find opportunity to work—and thus to produce an unnatural competition, which in all occupations tends to force wages down to the minimum on which men can live, and which workingmen are driven to resist by what President Glackin, in his address to the Anti-Poverty Society on last Sunday night, styled the resort to brute force. The result is to crowd people together too closely in the cities, to scatter them too far apart in the country. To say nothing of the moral, social and intellectual disadvantages which result from this unnatural distribution of population, there is a great obstacle put in the way of improvement, a manifest waste of productive forces.

The measure we propose, which would utterly destroy the speculative value of land, and would reduce the selling value of land to but a nominal figure, would remove this obstacle and prevent this waste. No one would care to take up land that he could not use, or to hold land unless it was put to its most valuable use. The homes of our farmers would be closer together, the poorer classes of our cities would no longer be compelled to herd in tenement houses, and the capitalist who proposed to erect a factory would no longer have to pay out so much of his capital for a site. Instead of that, he would pay the annual rental value of the land in taxes, but this would be in lieu of all other taxation. Thus the effect of this measure would be to throw open to labor and capital the means of production while relieving production from taxation. And the result of thus opening to labor the natural opportunities for the employment of labor would be to set to work every man willing to work; to do away with that unnatural competition which comes from a glutted labor market. It would be to create a demand for commodities that would set every wheel of industry in motion, and stimulate the forces of production to their utmost.

Clearly this would be greatly to promote the general prosperity and greatly to add to the general wealth.

CERTAIN services for society require an agent for their performance. To meet the expense of these things, funds have to be raised. To raise them by taxation of land values rather than by any other form of taxation would, the People thinks, minimize the discouragement to industry, inevitable from taxation in any form. This is why the People favors taxation of land values.—Providence People.

THE farmer who is told that the single tax on land values is designed to increase his burdens while lightening those of the bloated monopolists and aristocrats, ought to stop to ask why in thunder the bloated monopolists and aristocrats are not now howling for it. It is not the fashion for them to fight things that increase their power or lighten their burdens.—Vincennes, Ind. News.

THE land question, simmered down, is this: Did the Creator intend that all the children of His creation should have a footing upon the earth, or did he bequeath it to a few that they might levy tribute upon the balance of the people at will?—Omaha Truth.

JAPANESE WOMEN.

Very ugly, these poor little Japanese women! I prefer to make this brutal statement at once, to attenuate it later with mincing prettiness, graceful drollery, adorable little hands, and then rich powder, rose and gold on the lips, all manner of artifices.

Hardly any eyes at all, so little as to be almost nothing: two narrow slits, oblique and diverging, where roll wily or cajoling eyeballs, as between the barley opened lids of those cats whom the glare of daylight makes weary.

Above those little updrawn eyes—but very far above, very highly perched—are outlined the eyebrows, as fine as pencil marks, and not at all oblique, not at all parallel with the eyes that they accompany so badly; but straight on the same line, contrary to what it has been the custom to represent in our European pictures whenever the artist has had to portray a Japanese woman.

I believe that the particular strangeness of those little faces of women is entirely due to that disposition of the eye, which is general, and also to the development of the cheek, which is always swollen to roundness like a doll's; moreover, in their pictures, the artists of the country never fail to reproduce, exaggerating them even to improbability, those characteristic signs of their race.

The other features are much more changeable, varying with individuals first, and especially with social conditions. Among the common people the lips remain thick, the nose flat and short; among the nobility the mouth becomes thinner, the nose longer and finer, sometimes even curves in the shape of a slender eagle's beak.

There is no country where the feminine types are so clearly defined between different castes. Brown peasant women, bronzed like Indians, well balanced on their slim waists, plump and muscled beneath their everlasting dresses of blue cottonade; etiolated women of the cities, real diminutives of women, white and wan like sickly Europeans, with I know not what of hollowed, of undermined, beneath the flesh, which is the sign of races that are too old—all these working-women of the great cities seem to have been worn out, hereditarily worn out before birth, by too long a continuity of labor and of tension of mind over minute trifles; it seems as though upon their frail forms weighed all the weariness of having constantly produced since centuries those millions of baubles, those innumerable little works of exhausting patience, of which Japan is full. And among the princesses the refining influence of aristocracy, so far back does it date, has finished by fashioning extraordinary little artificial persons, with childish hands and busts whose painted faces, whiter and pinker than a fresh bonbon, indicate no age; their smile is far away, like that of ancient idols; their updrawn eyes have an expression of both youth and death.—From "Japanese Women," by Pierre Loti, in Harper's Magazine.

Methodical Persistency Wins.

It is amazing to those who have tried it to see what can be accomplished by laying aside even a small portion of time daily for a set purpose. Seize a fraction of your time, and lay it aside for a special object. If you take it as soon as possible after breakfast, you will be surest to get it. Do not curtail your sleep for any purpose. The duty of sleep is just as binding as any other duty. Women will never amount to anything in any department until they learn that the care of their health is a sacred duty.

Do you find you mental furnishings growing rusty and dim? By reading a good book fifteen minutes each day, you can effectually renew your mental vigor.

You cannot master an art by working fifteen minutes a day upon it; but the fruit of years of study in literature, music, or painting can be conserved through busy months by the devotion of even a few minutes daily, if you can get no more time to hard practice. Then the health can be greatly benefitted by even a short stroll in the open air when it is impossible to take longer ones. It is like the proverbial saving of the pennies and gathering up the fragments. The results are astonishing.—Domestic Monthly.

Made Him Sick.

St. Paul Man (on railway train)—It just makes me sick to see the cheap wit that's gotten off about St. Paul and Minneapolis, just as if there was a deadly rivalry between them.

Stranger—Well, isn't there any?

"Bless your heart, no; not a particle. Each place is contributory to the other, and we all recognize it. No feeling on the subject at all, sir—never was. Couldn't be, of course, among sensible people, you know. You are on your way to St. Paul, I presume?"

"No, I am going to Minneapolis, to settle there."

"Minneapolis? What do you want to bury yourself in that miserable little hole for?"—New York Weekly.

It Is Ever So.

"I see that our country paper has a new dress."

"I hadn't noticed it; however, I might have guessed as much, for I met the editor's wife to-day, and she was still wearing her old one."

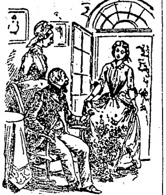
PART I—AT THE NORTH.

CHAPTER I.

IN THE MODERN MART.



Bennie Standish bounded into the room.

Angular beyond the hither boundary of primness, and not without its flavor of subacid, was the presence rising perpendicular to the cane sofa and seeming to glint in the flood of summer. For, on that glad June morning of 1860, a softened sunlight saturated the river breeze ere it swept into the wide French windows of Rose villa.

It needed neither the small bunch of keys dangling at her girdle nor the sleek bands of thinning hair above the knotted forehead to proclaim Miss Tabitha Fay's unmated state. Her whole being radiated spinsterhood, and characteristic, while not unpleasing, was the voice that said:

"Nonsense, Brother Standish! you are talking as though we had sold our darling into slavery!"

Benton Standish turned irresolutely and walked toward the window. His round, rubicund face grew shadowed and lengthened visibly as he looked out dismally upon the most tasteful garden on all the banks of the lordly Hudson. The breeze that played about his hair was heavy with odors pilfered from the flowers; but the sniff he gave was of discontent; the gaze, turned inward, recked little of the landscape, judging from the half soliloquy, half reply:

"U—um! True, Mason said nothing about mortgages and overdue notes. Neither of us could forget them, though. And I tell you, Sister Tabitha," he added more distinctly, "you hit it right. It's just selling the child to keep Rose villa in the family."

"It is rather late to speak of that now," the lady retorted in quiet monotone from behind the fortification of a fixed fact, "when the wedding is some six hours off."

"Yes, I know it is too late; but, sister, I never should have consented to let the wedding day be anticipated with such unseemly haste!" Mr. Standish spoke warmly and with decision.

"Mr. Mason thinks these impending troubles in the south make his presence imperative on his Red river plantations. Naturally his impatience could not wait their settlement."

"A woman worth marrying is worth waiting for!" Standish answered testily.

"Sometimes, Brother Standish, I think you are"——

"A donkey? So I am," he finished with a little laugh, dwindling to a sigh as he again turned to the window, adding: "But I'm worse than that; I'm a beggar! I tell you, Tabitha, this match was none of my making."

"I consider it extremely well made," was the retort—so quick as to prove that it had been of hers. "Mr. Mason is not much over 50; he has family"—and Miss Tabitha smoothed down caressingly her immaculate morning dress at each enumerated excellence—"reputation, a large fortune, and will inherit more."

"And Bennie is just 18," Standish said absently, as if to the Hudson below; "she has beauty, high spirit, not a dollar, and will inherit—debts!"

"Nonsense, Brother Standish!" began the unmated voice in the reprehension key; but it gradually changed the pitch, as curiosity overcame even combativeness. "But, good gracious! where can she be? Romping about the woods, I presume; and this her wedding day!"

As if in answer a fresh, girlish voice floated through the windows, in the bright notes of "Comin' Thro' the Rye," a light step bounded on the porch and stopped abruptly as the song ceased.

"Trim off the big leaves, Thomas, before you bring them in," the voice cried; and Bennie Standish bounded into the room, her arms full of flowers and forest leaves, her big garden hat falling back from masses of golden hair, blown about a fair young face flushed with exercise and health.

She was by no means one of those beauties who set sentimental poets dreaming, or make young artists rave for profiles. But she was a fresh, vivacious girl, with the grace of womanhood and the charm of childhood. A complexion of milk and strawberries was toned by a piquant sauciness and pride combined; while the deep blue eyes, naturally twinkling with merriment, had in them something that spoke of strong will, scarcely educated to control, which might on occasion flash out of them dangerously.

A willowy figure, quite plump enough for symmetry, completed an attractive picture, if not a very striking one. Early left motherless, Bennie's father had unceasingly and unreasoningly spoiled her, while his sister-in-law's alternating tenderness and severity were regarded rather as a jest than a restraint.

Care and money had both been lavished to give Bennie those accomplishments that fit our young ladies so perfectly for brides, if not for wives; and it was due to her innate truth of nature and her clear intuitions of right and wrong that they had left her the pure hearted girl she was. A finishing trip to Europe, lasting two years, had returned her heart whole, quick witted, and not a little reckless; but that often misused and meaning term "fast" had never been coupled with any act of hers.

Mr. Standish let his easy going disposition dominate all his business habits, and it left him this year heavily involved, especially to the wealthy southern planter whose partner he had become in cotton speculation. This Mr. Beverly Mason had migrated to the southwest and had largely prospered there. Generally accounted the very hardest of creditors, he had shown peculiar leniency in this case—a mystery that was cleared by his proposal, after much delay and with unwonted shyness, to make the hope of the Standish household the head of his own.

At first Bennie herself seemed strangely indifferent to the proposed arrangements, regarding them as a future possibility. She had contented herself with a few flippant speeches, but Miss Tabitha had raised the song of triumph, only checking the jubilant strain long enough to reproach her brother-in-law for not joining loudly in the chorus.

Vague rumors of coming trouble between the states of the Union had hastened Mr. Mason, summer though it was, to New Orleans on matters of moment, and, fearing to leave so tempting a prize behind during indefinite absence, he had warmly pressed for an immediate marriage. Again Miss Fay had overridden her brother's feebly opposed objections, and again Bennie had made no decided remonstrance. At times she would fall into absent moods, suddenly waking into bitter vein and deriding the situation with mocking laughter, that left the sting under it after the echo had died away.

So it fell out that on this bright June day every preparation was complete for uniting May and December at the little church near by. Miss Fay's triumph was completed by the summoning of a famous bishop to perform the rite. The wedding was to take place at sunset, and the happy pair were to take the evening boat for New York. Mr. Standish had, however, insisted on one point, from which all the spinster's "Song of Judith" could not move him. The hasty nuptials were to be as quiet and private as it was possible to keep them.

All that morning the bride elect had seemed perfectly happy; indeed, recklessly gay and "quite unwomanly," as Miss Fay described her mood.

"Smell those, you dear old papa!" she cried, rosy and panting, as she opened her plump arms and dropped their fragrant load upon the floor. And then the arms locked tightly around the old man's neck one instant, ere she turned to her aunt:

See, Tab, what a rent I've made in my skirt. But I've had my last scamper over the dear old hills until I come back, if ever—Mrs. Beverly Mason!"

The rich, musical laugh, rounding the words as though they were too good a joke to keep, stopped with strange abruptness, and no laughter in the eyes bore it company. Standish bent down and pressed his lips to the flushed brow.

"How rosy and plump you look, little woman!" he said, cheerily enough; "the picture of happiness and health!" But the face he again turned quickly to the Hudson belied the tone, and its expression spoke as plainly as speech, "It is selling her at so much a pound!"

"How do you know, auntie, dear? You never had one."

Mr. Standish turned quickly. Fair weather was essential for the coming launch into the deep waters of life, and storm was marking on Miss Fay's facial barometer.

"Bennie, my child," he began, "you are—um-m—perfectly happy? You don't mind"——

"Becoming the old man's darling and marrying my grandfather?" she finished for him in reckless, defiant rush of words. "Oh, dear, no! Why should I? He's nice enough, as old gentlemen go, and you all know I don't care"—she stopped suddenly, bending her head to gather the fallen flowers—"I think I don't care for any one else. And then Tab always reminds me that he's so rich, and that married folks must have money."

"Absurdity!" broke in Miss Tabitha. "You do not comprehend the awful solemnity of this sacrament! You do not know what marriage means!"

"Do you?" Bennie's head went pertly to one side, but her eyes twinkled with anything but the merriment responsive to her words. "But I do know, you dear old Tab. Marriage means new card plates, loves of bonnets, opera boxes, rounds of visits and unlimited credit at Stewart's! There! Don't I know?"

Miss Fay's thin lips closed ominously, but only emitted the words:

"Poor, motherless niece!"

"Poor, husbandless aunt!" Bennie imitated tone and expression with much humor and some bitterness. Miss Fay raised hands and eyebrows in fierce reproach, but before she could speak the girl whirled around and seized her in an embrace from which her thin limbs nor fast rising ire could release her.

"Now confess, you dear old Tab, that those are your sentiments! Eh?"

"Oh! that horrid Paris!" gasped the somewhat mollified but still struggling spinster.

"Don't preach, that's a dear," responded her niece, loosing the clasp of the rounded arms. "Don't preach, for my respected husband will probably do that for the rest of my natural life!"

Miss Tabitha still sniffed wrathfully.

"Oh! that Paris!" she repeated. "Finish a girl, indeed! It finishes all the propriety and all the heart out of her!"

Bennie stood still, her arms dropped at her side; the blue eyes dancing no longer, but fixed vaguely on the distant foot hills. She seemed to answer some inward thoughts rather than the spinster's words; but her own were borne on a deep sigh.

"Maybe you are right, auntie. Sometimes I believe I have no heart; and I know myself less than ever today. What I am you have made me. I am only a result; a something manufactured between tutors and dressmakers. What I am may be a sad fact, even a serious error. But the fact cannot be changed now, and the error is not mine, but that of our false society system!"

Miss Tabitha found no words to answer, for the girl's voice trembled, spite of the bitter words it bore, and tears that did not fall brimmed full the softened eyes. Reaching up she suddenly pressed her lips to the spinster's forehead as she added:

"Don't think I blame you, dear old Tab. You meant all for my good; and now it has all come for the best to your thinking. And if I ever find I have a heart you shall have a place in it—next to his!" And, throwing her arms around her father's neck, Bennie hid her face on his shoulder a moment. Then she ran to the table again and bent busily over the flowers; but the young face was bright no longer with sunshine of the heart. A quick cloud rose over the brow; but no human eye saw the tear that trembled an instant on the long lash ere it glistened like a diamond on the fresh rose leaf.

Did that crystal drop blot out the girl's implied falsehood as did the Recording Angel my Uncle Toby's oath?

Miss Fay's amazement did not permit her even to smooth the silvery bands the girl's caress had rumpled.

There was a suspicion of huskiness, but unwonted asperity, in Mr. Standish's undertoned response:

"Sister Tabitha, you never did understand Bennie!"

"Nonsense, Brother Standish!"

Miss Tabitha was herself again. Her foot was on its native heath of argument; and her voice was for war, if not still. But suddenly its key changed, as the frou-frou of skirts was heard on the gravel walk outside; and a splendid type of the New York girl confronted Mr. Standish at the window.

"Why, Edith dear, you are alone!" it concluded, with as near approach to a coo as Miss Fay's dignity and conformation could permit.

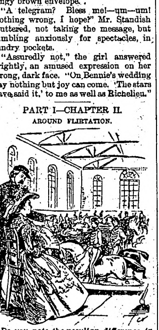
"Quite, since my cavalier, the telegraph boy from the village, handed me this and fled for dear life," the girl answered, in a rich, mellow contralto, with a caress in its tone, as she extended the dingy brown envelope.

"A telegram? Bless me!—um—um! Nothing wrong, I hope?" Mr. Standish muttered, not taking the message, but fumbling anxiously for spectacles, in sundry pockets.

"Assuredly not," the girl answered brightly, an amused expression on her strong, dark face. "On Bennie's wedding day nothing but joy can come. 'The stars have said it,' to me as well as Richelieu."

PART I—CHAPTER II.

AROUND FLIRTATION.



"Do you note the peculiar difference in their riding?"

Few studied poses could have been more striking than Edith Van der Huysen's easy grace, as she held the dingy envelope extended in her taper hand. It was a slim, aristocratic hand, not too white, and with firm lines and nervous fingers ending in daintily cared for nails. And the figure of which it ended the long and well muscled arms was perfect in its poise and in its curves, showing through the closely fitting costume. Nor did it need a second glance at the oval olive face, with its clear cut but calmly set features, or into those liquid brown eyes, that could glow almost to blackness under impulse of subdued passion, to proclaim her "to the manner born." Self reliance, decision and conscious power showed in every movement, while the olive brown complexion, clear as a blonde's, and the massive coils of almost blue black hair, gave a Spanish cast to the face which its features denied.

Straight descended from the real Dutch stock, Edith carried easily as a right her early won queenship in the society of the metropolis; and the reputed emptiness of Philip Van der Huysen's pocket had not retarded his daughter's unsought advance to the very front of belleship. Left motherless in early childhood, her inborn savoir-faire had carried her safely through the social teething, and she had escaped those diseases frequent in society infancy. Nor had two seasons of charity balls and German cotillon made any outward change, whatever inner revolution they may have worked, in the perfectly posed type of metropolitan womanhood, which at once attracted and dazzled the coterie of hyper gilded youth who tried to patronize her at the debutante's ball.

Invited for sojourns everywhere that wealth built country seats, and with that rare tact which shortens visits to the exact point of insistent renewal, Edith Van der Huysen had seen more of summer resorts and of summer homes in her two years of society than had most of her set already balancing on the uncertain edge of old maidenhood. Indeed she was so much in demand that society quite rebelled at her giving the major part of two consecutive summers to Bennie Standish, first at West Point for encampment; this year to the quiet of Rose Villa. But the girls had been friends and neighbors in childhood, had been "finished" abroad together, and Edith held with apparent loyalty to the old affection.

She had not gushed greatly over the Point, as is the wont of belles and would be belles, married or single, and an early indiscretion—scarcely unintentional in a woman whose strong point was tact—might in itself have barred her way to popularity with those petted, if not prudent, darlings of the sex, the cadets. At her very first cadet hop she had most innocently remarked to the dashing instructor of cavalry tactics:

There is a mental phonograph at The Point which seems to record even thoughts in every tent simultaneously; and "that stuckup Van der Huysen girl" was promptly voted, nem. con., not much of a beauty and not a bit bright. The cadets let her severely alone, with an ostentation of indifference that she bore with placidity that set all the women wondering, while she accepted what consolation she might from the ugly assistant surgeon. So grateful, indeed, did this seem to Miss Van der Huysen that it caused equal disquiet to his millionaire mother, presently domiciled at the same hotel, and to the Hon. Algernon Herbert Harcourt Greyling Spencer, younger son of Lord Martindale, who, being her shadow in town, had naturally followed her out of it.

"Deuced odd, you know, Miss Standish," he had one day confided to Bennie, as Edith and the doctor disappeared round a curve on Flirtation. "Can't for the life o' me see how she stands it. She tells me Sawbones isn't good form by any means; talks shop, you know. But when she isn't with him, round Flirtation here, hang me if she isn't always on the plain, or at a hop, with one of those twin kids!"

Nor was the Hon. Algernon far wrong, for utterly oblivious of phonographic iteration in camp and of sugary spite of other girls, the two most noted cadets of that encampment spent every hour off duty with Bennie Standish and her friend.

"Davie" and "John"—as their devotion to each other had dubbed them in that cadet nomenclature which borrows its pet names less often from Scripture than elsewhere—had quite as marked dissimilarities as had the two girls. Edith Van der Huysen had said of them to Bennie:

"To the rest they are marrons glaces to unpulled taffy. I cannot understand why really sensible girls should hunt down the cadets as they do, submitting even to be snubbed for the sake of being bored. Really, these boys are the most limited creatures I ever met—even in society. But your two friends seem to be men, and they surely are gentlemen."

And the belle's intuition had not erred in this conclusion, made on short acquaintance.

Adrien Latour was French au bout des ongles. An orphan of Creole family that boasted noble blood on both sides and inherited imperious indolence with its wealth, he was a born soldier. He had given his guardian and the haughty old grandmother, who idolized him, no peace until family influence had secured him the coveted appointment to the academy, which he hastened from school in Paris to accept.

Rising grade by grade in the corps, he had never received one military demerit, while often perilously grazing a "find," at the semi-annual "exams.;" only saved by his quick intelligence making up for negligence of class work. That he valued his first captaincy in the corps far above a commission in the engineers, all his friends understood; and he frankly avowed only ambition enough for graduation in the cavalry arm. Frank, impulsive and prodigally generous as the race and fortune he was born to warranted, the young Creole was conceded as the best rider and swordsman of the whole corps, with one exception. In the fencing school his peculiarly quick eye and flexile wrist ever met one opponent whose coolness and strength caught his lightning like play and repaid hit for hit. When the riding hall was thronged with beautiful and brilliant women and their "cit" danglers, with occasional officers off duty, pretty faces flushed and bright eyes eagerly followed the lithe, tall form that sat a horse with centaur like naturalness, guiding him seemingly more by intuition than by the light touch that hid the nervous strength of a hand trained from childhood. Near Latour, the best riders appeared effortful and stiff, the lightest rein seemed to tug at the bit. In all the "show movements" he was the cynosure of bright eyes and experienced ones alike; and even "Gallery Pete"—as the cadets named a showy Kentuckian who "rode for the girls"—failed to win the praise for his set feats which fell to Latour for ease and unconscious grace.

But when the wild rushes came and the flying ruck of riders swung at the [illegible] when the gleam of sabers made

UP A TREE.

A FAMILY Christmas-tree is an occasion of varying emotions, among which may be mentioned Joy, Envy, Fun, Grief, Hatred. Love. There may also be different varieties of these various emotions. For instance, Love may exist as Unrequited, Doubting.

Sally Leigh, old Mrs. Gunter's grand niece, always superintended the dressing and decking of the Gunter Family Christmas-tree, and this year she had selected to be her sole assistant, Joe Hallet, who was old man Gunter's first cousin, third remove.

She had selected him because she loved him; and as she knew he didn't care a rap for her, and was terribly bored by the whole business, she took a keen delight in bossing him about all the time. She despised herself for this weakness, but didn't allow it to interfere with her enjoyment.

Joe was acting his part beautifully. He could not have been glummer and less communicative and more obedient if he had really been married—a long time. He did exactly as he was told, and occasional groans were all that betrayed his real feelings. These only gave an added zest to Sally's pleasure, and Revenge crept slyly into the catalogue of emotions already noted.

The only trouble was, Joe was so exceedingly docile that in a surprisingly short time the popcorn, ornaments, candles, cornucopias and the lighter presents had been properly placed amid the branches, and the heavier articles disposed about the base.

"That all?" sighed Joe.

"Oh, no!" cried Sally, cheerfully. "There are two presents missing."

"Which?" asked Joe, with little interest.

"Why, yours to me, and mine to you, to be sure!"

"What—have you got a present for me?" asked Joe with surprise.

"Oh, never mind," said Sally; "I won't embarrass you by giving it to you if you haven't one for me."

"It won't embarrass me in the least."

"Well, it ought to. There; don't worry. I was only joking—see, I haven't any present for you, after all."

"Yes, you have," said Joe, who was beginning to wake up a little; "you've got one for me upstairs."

"Haven't!"

"Have!"

"Haven't!"

"Not if I've got one for you?"

"Honestly?"

"Now I know you have. Gave yourself away that time!"

"Mean!"

"I think you're horrid."

"Well, please."

"Will you have your present for me on the tree when I come down?"

"Yes, Cross my heart."

"On the tree?"

"On the tree."

"Remember—you've promised," and Joe was left alone.

He sat down on the box which supported the tree, took from his pocket a small but rather heavy package, placed it beside him, and continued to think.

You see, Joe had been thinking for some time, for several months, in fact for nearly two years; and more he thought, the less able he seemed to make up his mind. The difficulty was, he was thinking about Sall and he was trying to find out if he loved her or not.

He had as yet arrived at no settled conclusion. Sometimes he was sure he loved her very much; he saw clearly that it was all a mistake, and that he loved some one else a great deal better—himself usually.

Then he used to think if she would only give him some sign of caring for him it would make everything much easier. But he knew that she wasn't the girl to give her affections where they had not been sought, and as he had hitherto carefully abstained from committing himself, he foresaw that after he had once declared his intentions, he would have a long fight and a long wait before he got her, if indeed, he ever did,

Besides, he didn't know whether a man of his selfish nature was calculated to make such a woman happy. even if he were so constituted, and he admitted that possibility, he could never be sure that he would be happy with her. That seemed a dreary prospect to behold at the end of a long, uphill courtship. Now, if she would give him the least inkling of how she would act if she did ever get to love him—

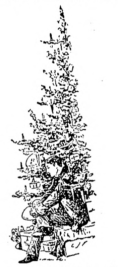
The door opened, and there stood—a pretty picture, surely; but did he really—

Suddenly she started, and turned pale. Her eyes searching quickly over the tree told her that nothing had been placed there in her absence, but there was Joe—Joe sitting close among the branches!

It was only for an instant, then the blood rushed back to her face as she saw—oh, the shame of it!—how manly her feelings had let her imagination play her false.

"I hate you!" Somehow her voice did not have the playful ring she meant to give it.

Joe looked up shocked and rather pale. Her greeting came like a dash of ice water on top of his long think.



"What do you mean?"

"You haven't any present for me."

"Yes, I have."

"Where, then?"

"Why, here, right before your eyes. Can't you see?" Putting his hand on the box at his side.

Sallie, looking straight into his eyes, saw only Joe. "But—you—said—you—would—put—it—on—the—tree."

"Yes; but it was slightly heavy to hang on the branches;" he could not help smiling at her earnestness.

"Yes, of course," her voice sounded very strangely. Joe noticed it. "But what is it?"

"Can't you see?" he asked rising from his seat.

"Yes, yes, I see; but what do you mean? You are fooling me; don't you se what a fool you're making of me?"

"No, I am not; I was never more earnest in my life—d—d—darling!"

"Then it's true! it's true! Joe," she whispered as his arms closed about her; "and you are my present after all. Joe, this is the best Christmas present I ever had in all my life."

"It's not half so good as mine."

And there was only one kind of Love present at the Gunter family Chistmas-tree, after all.

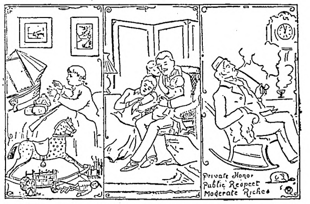
CHILDHOOD. MANHOOD. OLD AGE.



The Day Was Honored.

"They say the real old Christmas spirit is dying out; but I don't see it," observed the gentleman from Dead Horse Gulch, Arizona. "Now, our town is a quiet, conservative sort of place, and it's nussing a tired boom just now. And yet we had a lively, pleasant, genial sort of Christmas.

"First-off, Dick Carver undertook to clean out the town—before nine o'clock in the morning, sir!—and he made cullenders of three men before we put him to bed. Then we tarred and feathered the Sheriff—he had gone back on his election pledges, and the moral sentiment of the community was aroused. Then Jim Fowler had a dog that had just gone mad, and he let him loose in the street, and he was more fun than a goat—it was 'most an hour before that dog was shot. Then we ran a temperance lecturer out of town, and in the evening Bill Hasenpfeffer made a bonfire of his new barn, just for a show for the boys—he's a thorough-bred, Bill is, if he is a Dutchman.

"No, sir, the Christmas spirit ain't dying out, not while there's any sort of society left in Dead Horse Gulch, and you can tell anybody I said so."

A CHRISTMAS CAROL.

The heavens are bright on Christmas night
With many a twinkling star;
They burn and glow, now high now low,
And their light is shed afar.

They nod and blink with a cheery wink,
As if they wished to say,—
Be glad, be glad, forget to be sad,
"To-morrow is Christmas Day!"

They sing their song the whole night long,
Till out of the eastern sky—
Out of the blue, so steady and true.
Shines down a light from on high.

We watch it and never tire;
Its shining rays entrance our gaze.
And with awe our hearts inspire.

And we seem to hear through the midnight clear
'A voice of sweetness say,—
Behold the Star that shone afar
And lighted the shepherds' way.

"That showed them the place where in childish grace
The infant Savior lay;
And now, as then, is born among men
A glorious Christmas day."

A CHRISTMAS SERMON.

BY ROBERT J. BURDETTE.

Dearly beloved: The Scripture moveth us in sundry places, and about once a year, to yearn, with bowels of compassion, for the poor, to stretch out our hands to the needy, to send a load of limbwood to the widow, and to give the fatherless a job of shoveling off four dollars worth of snow for fifty cents. We send a barrel of last summer's clothing to the Montana Missionary in the blizzard season; we buy a five-dollar ticket to a ten-dollar charity ball, out of which we get fifteen dollars' worth of fun, and cry aloud "I am he that considereth the poor." Yea, verily, and thou considerest him a nuisance, for hath not the Wise Man said, "The poor is hated even of his own neighbor?" He hath—see Proverbs, XIV: 20—and you are the very neighbor he was thinking of.

Beloved, let us consider this matter a moment. I indeed expected that the announcement of the text would raise a howl that might stop the clock—"but none of these things move me." Let us see, not how much you have done for the poor this merry Christmas season, but what you have done for him all the year round. I am not given to criticising Providence, but sometimes, in my daring and sceptical moments I have thought that it might have been money in the poor man's pocket and "collops of fat on his flanks," had he been built, as to his enterior department, upon the plans and specifications of the cow, with four stomachs; or, with a storage lip like a pelican. Then, when the rest of the world had its annual spasm of Christmas benevolence, he might line himself with fat things full of marrow, and hibernate until the next December took us by the throat with "la grippe" again, and the fear of death should once more frighten us into renewing our fire insurance, and buying a cut-rate ticket to heaven over the Phylactery Broad Gauge. I cannot make you believe this now, when you have just helped to decorate a Christmas tree for the Blind Asylum; but if you would recall this sermon—which you will not—or remember the text which you cannot—about six months from now, I think it would grow upon you,

"All the brethren of the poor do hate him; how much more do his friends go far from him? He pursueth them with words, but they are gone." So it was in the days of Solomon. Is it much better now? This Christmas week your heart is warm; you say "the first-born of the poor shall feed and the needy shall lie down in safety" if it takes a dollar. But when the same poor man came to you in October and wanted to borrow seven dollars, you even wished that you had a sword in your hand that you might slay him. You can stand him once a year, when all the world is bent upon gorging him until he "loatheth the honeycomb"; but to see the beggar lying at the gate every time you go out, that is trying. We could love him were he a naked heathen, far, far away in benighted lands where we could never see him; but to stumble over him every time we go to church or theatre, euchre-party or prayer-meeting, communion table or ball-room, this makes us tired. But, brethren, he isn't promised to us as an annual blessing, like the latter rains; he's an all-the-year-round reminder of God's riches and our stewardship, "For the poor shall never cease out of the land; therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor and to thy needy in thy land." Overhaul your Deuteronomy for that; it will probably take you all the rest of the morning to find it, but you will run across a whole volume of good things while you are looking for it.

Thanks to Christianity, thanks to every church founded on the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth, we do take better care of our poor, a thousand fold, than Solomon, or his father before him or his sons after him, ever did. But we have yet to learn that while spasmodic charity is better than none, Christmas ought to last all the year round. And, indeed, there is no reason why it shouldn't. Because no man knoweth just when it should come. If we are positive about anything connected with the 25th of December, we know this, that Christ was not born on that date. So as we can't agree upon the date for observing Christmas, why not divide it up all through the year? It doesn't pay to save all our charity for an annual deluge. A waterspout isn't a good thing for a garden. A cloud-burst destroys more crops than it helps. What blesses the land is not the thunderstorm, advertising itself far and wide with noise and fire, cyclone, lightening, thunder, roar and crash. The smiling farm and dirty lane, the garden and the stony street laugh in gratitude for the commonplace, quiet, rather drizzle-drozzle that comes down without attracting much attention to itself.

"Love covereth a multitude of sins," sayeth the Apostle Peter, and of a verity, brethern, the little short-lived love we feel for our neighbor at Christmas time is an ulster made to serve as an ulster in July and an ulster in December. You have given a Christmas token to each of the servants, if so be that you are like Canaan, "a servant unto servants." That is right. But did you pay their wages regularly all the year? And if you didn't, don't you know that prompt payment is ever so much better than a present? "Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant that is poor and needy, whether he be of thy brethren or of thy strangers that are in thy land within thy gates. In his day shalt thou give him his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it, for he is poor, and setteth his heart upon it; lest he cry against thee unto the Lord, and it be sin unto thee." Is there a dressmaker or a tailor, a shoemaker or a carpenter, hired man or servant girl holding a claim against you this week that you have put off to suit your own convenience? "Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt." You'd better; because if you forget it, there are a hundred people right here in this congregation, who remember it for you, and who will take frequent pains to remind each other that they can remember when your grandmother hadn't clothes to wear to church. And this story, oft repeated, will lead to the belief that your grandmother dressed in a palm leaf fan and was baptized in the river Congo by a missionary.

Do not abate one jot of your Christmas benevolence; but do not admit the firm of Mammon & Mammon to your dealings. To whom are you most apt to send the costliest gifts? Do ye not lend to those of whom ye hope to receive? And how often do we read that the employes of a certain house have clubed together to present a gold watch to the boss? "He that giveth to the rich shall come to want." Do not make Christmas a financial burden and worry yourself and friends. "The desire of a man is the measure of his kindness;" a token wrought by one's own hand is a treasure to the friend who receives it. A letter of a dozen lines is better than an insane frenzy of a Christmas card, representing a howling snow-storm on the seashore at midnight, with a woman dressed for bed, and half a dozen bare-foot children picking up sea-weed with hot-house blooms on it, with a verse of poetry that doesn't rhyme scan, or mean anything, printed in pale letters on a white ground on the margin of the nightmare. And is it not so, in these days of high art, that it is even cheaper to give unto a friend a house and lot, than a second-prize Christmas rebus? And is it not so, beloved, that ofttimes the women of the household have worn themselves out in the preparations for Christmas, so that it was the hardest day of all the year to them? And is it not so, that people labor to remember all to whom they should send gifts, and make a catalogue of their friends? Verily, our love is altogether lighter than vanity when that costs us an effort. Rather had we be forgotten than have people tax the brain into a headache, trying to remember us. Give simple gifts out of the fullness of your hearts.

After the deliverance of the Jews from the plots of Haman, and the days of the deliverance were established among the Jews in the provinces of King Ahasuerus—the 14th day of the month of Adar and the 15th day of the same, "as the days wherein the Jews rested from their enemies, and the month which was turned unto them from sorrow to joy, and from mourning into a good day: that they should make them days of feasting and joy, and of sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor." Now, there is a good way to celebrate Christmas. If you love me, send a turkey to a poor family down the alley; if you want to make your brother a present, give it to the poorest man you know; if you want to surprise your father with a gift, give it to some needy old fellow of whom he never heard. That will insure for you a right royal, merry Christmas.

A Hunting Incident.

On one occasion two sportsmen in Africa witnessed a strange sight. They were on horseback and had ridden a few miles up a certain stream searching for game of any kind. They had arrived at a thick belt of forest, consisting of acacia and evergreen trees, when they were startled by the sound of breaking branches and the unmistakable rushing of some heavy animals through the thicket.

Both men looked to their rifles and then drew rein to watch the issue. A few seconds only had elapsed when two full-grown giraffes were seen to break from the thicket and strike out at full gallop for the plain beyond.

But the two hunters were quite unprepared for the extraordinary sight that met their eager gaze as the wild creatures flew past. A large leopard had bounded on the back of one of them, while still in the forest, and was now seated firmly on its shoulders, tearing the poor animal's neck with the savage ferocity of its kind.

The other giraffe, mad with terror, soon left its companion far behind, the poor creature's life-blood flowing from its neck and streaming over its side. The sportsmen's dogs now joined in the chase, following close upon the heels of the enfeebled animal, already tottering to its fall. Soon they overtook it and began barking at its heels, but the giraffe did not give in without one struggle.

Lifting one of its hoofs it dashed it backward with unerring aim, striking down the foremost dog and throwing it several yards to the rear, where it lay struggling in the agonies of death. But this effort was the last. Jerking its long neck violently outward, the giraffe reeled over on one side and fell heavily to the earth, severely crushing the leopard in its fall. Both animals were killed by the two sportsmen.

The leopard, though fierce, is rather a cowardly animal, and it is not usual for it to attack game so large as the giraffe, especially where antelopes abound.

Poisoned by Scrofula

Is the sad story of many lives made miserable through no fault of their own. Scrofula is more especially than any other a hereditary disease, and from this simple reason: Arising from impure and insufficient blood, the disease locates itself in the lymphatics, which are composed of white tissues; there is a period of fœtal life when the whole body consists of white tissues, and therefore the unborn child is especially susceptible to this dreadful disease. But there is a remedy for scrofula, whether hereditary or acquired. It is Hood's Sarsaparilla, which by its powerful effect upon the blood expels every trace of the disease and gives to the vital fluid the quality and color of health. If you decide to take Hood's Sarsaparilla do not accept any substitute.

Bad Heads Take Notice.

From Good Housekeeping.

Physicians assert, and it seems at least reasonable, that the condition of the hair is an index to the health of the owner; that a scanty growth indicates impaired vitality, that where the hair is thick, glossy and rich in color it indicates bodily vigor and health, and this is undoubtedly true. Another alleged cause for the scanty growth is the custom of keeping the head closely covered, and this is supported by the fact that peasant women of Europe, who work all day in the fields with little or no covering to the head, have the most luxuriant growth of hair. It is quite probable that both of these hypotheses are correct. Certainly the Breton peasant girl, toiling in the fields with the brawn of muscle and of endurance fully equal to that of her brother, enjoys a degree of health greatly superior to the larger portion of our country women—although we are not quite prepared to adopt that form of life, no, not even for the sake of beautiful hair; but it is quite possible, by care and painstaking, to preserve and improve that which we have.

The True Christmas Spirit.

Has the spirit of Christmas come to you? I do not mean the spirit of Christmas as evinced by the dainty things from the Christmas-tree, the plums in the pudding, or the rich juice of the gravy; but I do mean—are you ready to put out your hand to her whom you have thought did you an unkindness?

Are you ready to ask forgiveness for the thoughtless word spoken?

Are you ready to overlook what seemed to you a slight? And are you ready to ask that each one near and dear to you may be joyful and happy, and that the stranger at the gates may not be forgotten?

Unless you can do all this the Christmas spirit is not in you.

And if it is not, then, my dear woman, get down on your knees and pray to that little Child who came on earth so many years ago that He might bring to it light and joy, and ask Him to open your heart to the light and love of kindness.

Do you want to make a happy Christmas for yourself and for other people? Then give, and give royally. Royal giving means generous bestowing of the best that you have to those least used to possessing.

Your royal gift may be but a love-message, but be sure if its given in the name of that little Child it will bring happiness whereever it goes, and, like the water of the fountain it will return to you with its virtues a thousand times greater, and you will be made better and younger by it. In your joy remember the children, not just your own—they have you to look after them but think of the little ones whose homes are bare, where life is like a tossing sea.

Remember the sick children. Think of the joy a beautiful toy, a great round orange, a big bag of candies only to be looked at, will bring to the little ones whose limbs are tied down forever. Think of the great picture book over which the eyes will open wide—eyes, my friend, that will soon be closed forever in death; and for the great and intense delight felt when a wonderful tree is recognized, or a bird's name is known to the little boy whose life has been spent in the close streets. These are gifts that you will never regret. Give of them—give of your plenty and from your heart, and be sure that to each little one of your own will come special happiness because you have remembered the sufferers among the babies. When that Divine Baby slept so quietly in the stable, the great kings of the earth thought it worth while to bring presents to Him, and surely as you consider the least among these, He will remember you. Let the bells ring out then on Christmas morning and let your heart beat in unison as you know that you have brought joy unto His little ones. Children are God's own angels sent by Him to brighten our world, and what we do for these messengers from the sky, especially at that time of the year which belongs to them, will come back to us threefold, like unto bread cast upon the waters.

ANTICIPATION.

Remember, the first Christmas gifts were laid at the feet of a child—a poor child of humble parents. Give your gifts then to the humble, to the poor, to the helpless, and thus will your own Christmas be a happy one.

A Novel Christmas Tree.

The Art Interchange gives some most capital suggestions for the adornment of a tree for a fancy fair or bazar, and with some adaption it would prove a most acceptable Christmas tree. Select a large tall pine tree, and tie on it about two thousand oranges made of orange-colored flannel. Those who have made balls for the boys will know how to go about the work of cutting the pieces so as to fit. Leave one of the seams open so as to stuff the orange with cotton, and imbedded in the cotton are to be placed the gifts. Label each orange with the price and character of each, whether it is a boy's, girl's bachelor's, maiden's housewife's, grandma's, etc. Of course, have in each orange some little article suitable for the one it is intended for. See, too, that the article be worth the price affixed to the label. For the dollar oranges there may be tiny brooches' scarf-pins, rings, silver paper cutters, topped off with little heads and jewels for the eyes, silver thimbles, bonbon boxes, cuff and collar buttons, and others that may be suggested by those already enumerated. In the bachelor's orange might be pin-balls, or that useful, old-fashioned article, a "house-wife." In grandma's, a case or wiper for her spectacles. In the ten-cent oranges for boys and girls might be put candies, oddly-fashioned toys, pencil-sharpeners etc. In each case let the article be worth the price indicated. By buying the articles at wholesale, and having the oranges stuffed and made by those who are willing for "sweet charity's sake" to give their time for that purpose, a very fair margin of profit can still be made for whatever philanthropic or benevolent object the tree is gotten up.

Such a tree will prove most available for Christmas, providing rare sport and pleasant surprises. Wrap the gifts in many and intricate foldings of tissue-paper to offord further mystification, and have each select an orange for himself or herself. Of course, in this case the gift need not be costly, but may be only for jollification, on account of incongruity of the many of the gifts.

REALIZATION.

Indian Christmas.

Away up on the northern shore of Lake Winnipeg is Norway House, one of the oldest and largest stations of the Hudson Bay Company. To this point the Indians of a large territory bring their furs for sale or exchange. In the winter season Norway House has been a lively place for many years, especially during the holidays, when the company has been accustomed to provide some appropriate entertainment for its Indian hunters and trappers. A Christmas dinner given here more than forty years ago is described by Mr. Ballantyne.

It was with something like awe that I entered the room, and beheld two long rows of tables, with puddings, pies, tarts, stews, hashes, and vegetables of all shapes, sizes and descriptions smoking thereon. I feared for the Indians, although they can stand a great deal in the way of repletion; moderation being, of, course, out of the question, with such abundance of good things placed before them.

A large shell was sounded after the manner of a bugle, and all the Indians of the village walked into the room and seated themselves, the women on one side of a long table, the men on the other. Mr. Evans stood at the head, and asked a blessing; and then commenced a work of demolition, the like of which has not been seen since the foundation of the world.

The pies had strong crusts, but the knives were stronger; the paste was hard and the interior tough, but Indian teeth were harder and Indian jaws tougher; the dishes were gigantic, but the stomachs were capacious, so that ere long numerous skeletons and empty dishes alone graced the board.

One old woman, of a dark brown complexion with glittering black eyes and awfully long teeth, set up in the wholesale line, and demolishing the viands so rapidly that those who sat beside her, fearing a dearth in the land, began to look angry; fortunately, however, she gave in suddenly while in the middle of a venison pasty, and reclined languidly backwards, with a sweetly contented expression of countenance, while her breath came thickly through her half open mouth, she gently fell asleep,—and thereby, much to her chargin, lost the tea and cakes which were served out soon afterwards by way of dessert.

When the seniors had finished, the juveniles were admitted in a crowd, and these soon cleared the remnants of the feast.

Holiday Puddings and Pies.

Recipes for Christmas puddings and for mince pies have been given so many times that every one can easily get the rules, but there are some ways of preparing these dishes which are the secret of success that are not so well known. All fruit puddings, cake or pies, of the rich dark types associated with Christmas must be made several weeks before they are wanted, in order to acquire proper flavor. The pudding had better be made at least two weeks before, and boiled and hung till needed in a cold storeroom, upstairs, where there can be no danger of dampness. The mince pie should be baked and set on the pantry shelf, covered up; the cake baked and also stored away. Old-time housekeepers always made rich pound cakes and a peculiar kind of rich cookies at this season, which are much better made a week before they are used. A genuine English plum pudding is packed tight in the tin, and no room is left for it to swell. It is then covered up tight and boiled in boiling water at least six hours when cooked, and an hour longer on Christmas Day. This produces a pudding dense with fruit, black and heavy, it is true, but like the English pudding.—Tribune.

THE DRUMSTICK.

Behold my rotund wealth of meat,
With all its juices, rich and sweet!
How firm, how solid, are my parts,
And how I go straight to the hearts
Of children, with distended jaws,
In wait to hide me in their maws.

Ah! how I love to lie in state
Upon the table, while you wait
With eager eyes and teeth that burn,
Until it comes to be your turn.
How crisp the skin, and, oh! how brown,
And how I tickle going down;
And, then, my bone, oh! what delight,
To pick it till it's clean and white.

How would you like, on Christmas Day,
To tramp till noon and then, we'll say,
To come back home, well almost starved?
And find me waiting nicely carved?
Between your finger and your thumb
You hold me up, thus (yum, yum, yum!)
I tickle every nerve, I thrill
Your stomachs, and I fill the bill,
And with all men I nothing lack—
I fact, I have the inside track!

A SUITABLE XMAS PRESENT

Dick and Maggie had been married only three months. As is often the case, some of their wedding presents were duplicates, while some other things, just as necessary, were forgotten altogether. The worst of it was, that, as they lived in a village, and the presents were all from dear friends or relatives, they could not exchange them, as we are told they sometimes do in the cities, However, Maggie being a sensible little woman, with the knack of making things do, they had got along very well.

It was the first of December, and Maggie, as she arranged the tea-table, was reviewing, mentally, her list of presents for Christmas. It had been such a busy year—first, the endless perparations for the wedding, and since then, the setting to rights and making pretty of her little home—that she had not found the time for much "fancy-work," so she would have to buy the most of them.

She knew just what mother and the girls would like—father, too—in fact, her list was all complete and satisfactory, with the exception of something for Dick. "Last, but not least, oh, no!" she thought to herself with a happy smile. If he only smoked! To be sure, she was glad he did not; she thought it an untidy, expensive habit, but there were always so many pretty things one could give a smoker.

During the progress of their evening meal, Maggie was so unusually quiet, that Dick finally noticed it, and asked.

HA! HA! SO THEY WATCHED FOR ME, DID THEY?

"What's up, little woman? Anything gone wrong to-day?"

"No. Why?"

"You seem so quiet."

"Oh, I've been thinking."

"That's nothing new. What about?"

"About Christmas. I can't think of anything to give you; you have everything."

"That's so. Don't give me anything. You have given me yourself; that will do for one while."

"What rubbish!" she said, with a pleased blush. "Anyway, I want to give you something; it would not seem like Christmas if I didn't!"

"Well, get something we will both enjoy—something we need about the house. That will do first rate."

The next day, as soon as Maggie had finished washing the dinner-dishes, and had tidied the kitchen, she donned her stylish walking suit, and set out for one of the two hardware stores of the village. Not finding anything that suited her rather fastidious taste, she left an order with the proprietor, to be sent to the city and filled. Then, visiting some other stores to complete her list of presents, she turned her face homeward, with a feeling of satisfaction that the problem was solved.

The following week, Maggie invited her mother, Mrs. Ripple, and the girls, Annie and Katie, to spend a long day with her. Pa Ripple was to come home with Dick at noon. It was an occasion when Dick and Maggie felt very anxious that their little establishment should have its "best foot foremost;" for, although the family had "dropped in" singly, time and again, at meal-time, this was their first attempt to have them all at a formal dinner.

The table looked very pretty in all the bravery of bridal linen, china and silver. As Maggie proudly surveyed it, she heard her father and Dick come in. The latter came hurrying out, his arms full of bundles. "See here, Pet," he began, in a pleased tone, "I saw them unpacking these grapes and oranges as we came along, and I thought they would give just the right look to the table. And look at this," opening a long package, "I remembered how I have had to carve with the butcher-knife all along, and thought it would never do with all our finery, to-day, and I saw this nice carving set at Hardy's, and I couldn't resist. Perhaps it was extravagant," he continued, answering an inexplicable look on her face, "but we will call it part of our Christmas in advance. Is it all right?"

"Yes, of course you dear fellow!" she answered, swallowing a great many unspoken thoughts. "It is just what I was wishing for. Now go in, and make yourself charming, while I take up dinner."

"You are sure you are pleased? I thought it would just suit!"

"Yes, yes!" she said hurriedly, "go, or things will scorch!"

When all were seated around the glittering table, and Dick, with a flourish, took up the new carving knife and fork, Annie and Katie exchanged glances, and then looked at Mrs Ripple.

"Something new?" asked the latter.

"Yes," said Dick, "I got them today; I was tired of carving with the butcher knife."

Katie looked at Annie again, and both giggled.

"What's the joke?" said Dick.

"Nothing," said Katie. Pa and Ma Ripple were both smiling now, and Dick looked stupidly from one to the other.

"I declare, I don't see anything funny!" he said at last.

"Tell him!" "Tell him!" cried the two girls, now laughing outright.

"Yes, do," said Dick.

"There, there, girls, don't be silly! They are laughing, Dick, because when we went to the city shopping, two weeks ago, we all settled on a handsome carving set as a Christmas present for you and Maggie; for we remembered that you had none, and thought it would please you both."

"Did you!" cried Maggie, "and only last week, I left an order for one at Steele's for Dick's Christmas gift, because he told me to get something we both wanted, and I thought we needed that most of all."

"There! I knew you were not pleased somehow, when I came with this! No wonder!"

"Ha! ha! ha!" "He! he! he!" "Ho! ho! ho!"

Long and loud, they all laughed, some one of them beginning again, and so starting the others, every time there was a pause. It was a merry meal.

As they arose from the table there were sounds of an arrival in front of the house—wheels, then the gate latch clicking, and voices. Going out, they found Dick's father and mother, just in from their home in the country. As soon as the confusion had subsided, they were told the "carving-set joke." They were not so much amused as had been expected, but looked at each other, and said:

"Well, did you ever!"

"Now what's the matter!" exclaimed Dick.

"Why, Pa and I," said his mother, "had sent for one, too, We noticed, when we were here last, that you didn't have one."

Here the old lady's voice was drowned in shouts of laughter. How they laughed, and laughed!

"I hope and trust," said Dick finally, wiping his eyes, "that nobody else has noticed that we haven't a carving set!"

His Christmas Cigar.

Mrs. Minks—"Why, howdedo, Mrs. Winks, buying Christmas presents, I suppose?"

Mrs. Winks—"Yes, I'm trying to find something for my husband."

"How fortunate you met me. I just made such a discovery. I suppose Mr. Winks smokes?"

"Yes, like a locomotive."

"So does Mr. Minks, and I thought as long as he would be sure to spend money for cigars anyhow, I might as well spend it for him and get cigars for his Christmas present."

"How wise you are! Why, it won,t cost a cent extra, will it?"

"That's just what I was going to explain. Mr. Minks pays ten cents apiece for his cigars, and that means $10 a hundred, you know?"

"Yes I suppose so."

"Well, I went to a store, and what do you think; the man offered me some cigars in a box just covered with beautiful pictures at $1.25 a box, and there's a hundred in a box."

"What a bargain?"

"Yes, I bought the whole stock. Isn't it splendid?"

"Are you going to pay for that package at this end?" asked on express carrier, as he watched a lady who, having wrapped up an express package and addressed it on one side, was about to address it on the other side also. "Yes," she replied. "Do you want to pay twice?" asked the expressman. "You are very liable to be charged twice for an express package if you mark it on both sides. After a package is paid for in advance, or at the point of shipment, we mark it 'paid' on the side of the address. When the billing clerk gets that package the chances are just even that he is presented with the side which is not marked paid, and he bills 'collect.' Never address both sides of the package. It by any means your package gets open, the bill accompanying it will tell the expressman where it goes.

Had To Saw Her Out.

Several hundred people crowded the street in front of Galt's jewelry store one morning, attracted by the sorry plight of a comely young woman who sat on the flag-stones right in front of one of the big windows. One daintily shod foot peeped perforce from under her skirts, and the other was down in the coal hole under the sidewalk.

It seems that the iron and glass grating that lights the vault under the sidewalk just before the plate glass window was broken. The hole did not seem large enough for a child's foot to slip through.

The young woman, a pretty blonde in a handsome dark green dress, stopped to look at the jeweler's wares in the window. Suddenly she gave a little shriek, and seemed to loose half a foot of her stature. She was evidently much distressed at something, and little wonder. Her French boot had slipped through the hole in the grating and her leg had followed it half way to the knee, as far as it could go. She tried to pull it out, but it was wedged fast, So she sat down on the flagstones and began to cry from fright and pain and mortification.

She was at once surrounded by a crowd. The police came and made the people stand back, and a kindly faced old lady did what she could to comfort the unfortunate girl,

Mr. Galt sent to a machine shop for a couple of men and they came with saws, hammers and crowbars and set about breaking one of the bars of the iron grating so as to release the imprisoned foot. It took fully a half hour, and the crowd got bigger every minute, but finally the iron bar was sawed through and the pretty girl was freed from the most awkward situation of her life. Then she took a carriage and went home.—Washington Post.

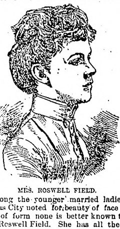
KANSAS CITY'S BELLES.

MAIDS AND MATRONS WHO HAVE FAIR FACES AND BRIGHT MINDS.

Nearly Every Type of Beauty Represented by the Young Society Leaders of the Big Burgh on the Missouri Border. Witty and Winsome Women.

[Copyright by American Press Association.]



MRS. ROSWELL FIELD.

Among the younger married ladies of Kansas City noted for beauty of face and grace of form none is better known than Mrs. Roswell Field. She has all the life and energy of the New England girl, with the beauty and style of the fair southerner. She has a winning smile for each newcomer, and makes a friend for life of him who once enjoys the pleasure of her acquaintance. As a hostess she is perfection itself. She has acquired the delightful art of making the evenings in her little cottage a pleasure to be sought after by those who are ready to vote banquet or ball a bore. Her husband is one of the best known of the newspaper men of Kansas City, a charming conversationist, an accomplished performer upon the violin and piano, and a thoroughly popular man. Mrs. Field's beauty is rather of the French type—black hair and eyes, a clear olive complexion and delicate features. She is very lively and vivacious, fond of society and the theatre, and one without whom no social entertainment is a success. She is among the best known and most beautiful of the younger married ladies of Kansas City.

formerly Miss Simms, of Cincinnati, and was a belle in that city of many pretty girls. She was married there, and is related to many of the most prominent people of that place. She is decidedly talented, and were she not so popular in society it is probable that she would be known by her work as an artist. She has a positive passion for portrait painting, and this is coupled with talent that is extraordinary. Notwithstanding her social duties, therefore, some of the best portraits in Kansas City are the work of Mrs. Bouton's hand. Mrs. Bouton is of medium height and has a beautifully rounded figure. She has large, lustrous brown eyes and dark brown hair that crowns an intellectual brow. She is the wife of a well known business man, and her home is adorned by many exquisite gems of art.

Miss Mattie Slavens, daughter of Mr. J. W. S. Slavens, a prominent capitalist, is a type of perfect southern beauty. Great brown eyes of unfathomable depth, features as faultless in their lines as if chiseled out of marble, form of perfect symmetry, she is a girl who at once attracts attention wherever she may go. She is divinely fair. Miss Slavens is a graduate of Wellesley and a pupil of the Conservatory of Music at Boston. After the completion of her studies she spent two years in Europe, traveling throughout its length and breadth, and visiting the farther east. She is a splendid linguist and very accomplished. She lives in Hyde Park, the aristocratic residence section of the city, in a palatial home.

MISS MATTIE SLAVENS.

There are many pretty debutantes anxiously looking forward to the gayeties of the winter. Among the most beautiful of this season's "buds" will probably be Miss Mamie Devol, daughter of Gen. Devol, the collector of internal revenue for the Kansas City district. Miss Devol is the happy possessor of the qualities that attract and retain friends, and a brilliant social success is undoubtedly before her.

Miss Cora Warner is the daughter of Maj. William Warner, ex-congressman, ex-commander of the G. A. R. and a leading Republican politician. Miss Warner's debut was made, therefore, in Washington, and she came to her home in Kansas City after a delightful winter there. She is rather tall and has a willowy figure, and large black eyes that sparkle like diamonds when lighted up in conversation. For two years she has been a figure in the gay society circles of the west.

A constant friend and companion of Miss Warner is Miss Ada Nave, a beautiful and accomplished girl, who rumor has it will grace Kansas City society for the last time this season, and then reign as queen in a home of her own.

Miss Lora Bullene is the daughter of the Hon. T. B. Bullene. She is very tall, a striking looking girl, with distinguished manners. Her features are regular, complexion brilliant, eyes dark, shaded by the longest of lashes, and eyebrows delicately curved. She is always gowned in exquisite taste, marked by an individuality that charms at once.

Miss Mamie Drennon's beauty is of a kind that a portrait does not do justice to, as the play of her features and a complexion as delicate as the blush of the peach constitute her chief charm. Miss Drennon is of medium height and of very graceful form. Her large brown eyes have an expression of innocence that appeals at once to the best qualities of the sterner sex. Miss Drennon is beautiful at all times, but evening dress is particularly becoming to her.

Miss Mayme Chappel is the daughter of Mr. Phil E. Chappel, banker and capitalist and ex-state treasurer. She is an artist of much expression and an accomplished girl. She is very fond of horseback riding, and never looks better than in close fitting riding habit and tall hat, dashing along on a spirited animal that seems proud of the burden it bears.

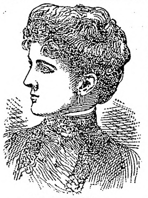
Miss Nellie McGee, who is soon to wed Mr. William Nelson, has been considered one of the beauties of Kansas City ever since she made her debut, two years ago. Miss McGee is slightly above medium height and has dark hair and eyes.

Mrs. Lathrop Bulline is listed among the most beautiful of the young married ladies of Kansas City. At theatre, reception or ball she is always marked for her exquisite style, carriage and dress. She is tall and magnificent looking, and wears her golden hair like a crown upon her head. Her eyes are large and of deep and tender blue. Her complexion is as near perfect as a complexion could be. She is a dream of loveliness.

Miss Carrie Smith is one without whom a list of the beautiful girls of Kansas City would be incomplete. Miss Smith has features as clear cut as a cameo profile, and hair and eyes as black as an Egyptian night. She is slender, rather tall, and as graceful as a flower. Her face brightens and lightens with changing thoughts, and as smile chases smile over her lips and eyes and cheeks her beauty sparkles as a drop of dew in the early light of the sunbeam.



MISS CARRIE SMITH.

L. D. HOBART.

Hunting for Horrors.

The horrible in truth and fiction has a strange fascination for people. In his cell at Woodstock jail, Birchall, the Canadian murderer, who expiated his crime on the gallows, was kept busy reading and answering letters from all parts of the world.

His correspondence was heavy. People wrote poems to him; sentimental women gushed over him and asked for autographs and locks of hair.

The dime museums submitted bids for the clothes he had worn on the day when Benwell was murdered, and these Birchall coolly knocked down to the highest bidder, getting $150 for the suit.

The relic hunters almost stripped the woods in securing mementoes of the murder, and there is not a tree within 100 yards of the scene which does not bear the carving of the crank. Names and dates are visible everywhere—they have utilized every inch of space in recording their visits, and the gloomy swamp has been converted into a fashionable resort!

It is a grim and ghastly business. People crossed the water, coming thousands of miles to get a glimpse of Birchall and the scene where the bloody tragedy was enacted. To such a murderer's autograph is priceless, and a lock of hair a thing to be treasured and dreamed over.—Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph.

A cheap and efficient lagging for steam pipes can be made out of some of the waste products of paper manufacture. The waste products in question are chiefly those coming from the different cleaning and sorting machines, which are of a fibrous nature. When dry they are mixed with potter's earth in the proportion of four to one, enough water being added to make a plastic compound. This is spread by hand over the surface to be protected in thin successive layers. When dry the coating is said to adhere firmly, and it has the additional recommendation of entailing no greater cost than that of mixing and applying it.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Bones are necessarily more or less heavy structures, but the bones of most birds, while their solid substance is exceedingly strong, are wonderfully lightened by the details of their arrangement, and still more by the fact that most of them contain not marrow, but warm (and therefore light) air.

Notice of Mortgage Foreclosure.

Default has been made in the conditions of a certain mortgage, and in the payment of the debt secured thereby, which said mortgage bears date July 31st 1882, and on said date was duly executed and delivered by Samuel Meunir, mortgagor, to the Colonial and United States Mortgage Co., (Limited) mortgagors, a corporation duly organized, and authorized to transact business in Minnesota, and which said mortgage was duly recorded in the office of register of deeds in and for the county of Polk, Minnesota, on the 31st day of July. A. D. 1882 at 4:45 o'clock p. m. in book "G" of mortgages, on pages 508, 509 and 510. That thereafter, to-wit: On the 16th day of August 1887, said mortgagee, for value received, sold and duly assigned said mortgage to Albert W. That the southwest corner of the cellar is the "cyclone safety point."

That there is no medicine so universally applicable to sickness as fresh air and sunshine."

That blowing out the gas before retiring is funny—to every one except the one who tries it.

That you may swear as hard as you please but it will not remove grease spots.

That the Wisconsin Central is the most popular line between Minneapolis and St. Paul and Milwaukee and Chicago.

ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

Jos. Smith, J. T. Knight and Frank E Hunt went to the county seat Monday.

Mr. Frank Hunt is now attending the last meeting of the old board of county commissioners. Mr. Hunt has served the people of his district well and faithfully during his term.

Mrs. B. Zaiser returned from Fergus Falls and Faribault Saturday.

A slight change in the temperature.

We wish all our readers a MerryChristmas.

Ed Hamry, the North Side hustler, will as soon as he disposes of his stock remove to Fairhaven—Washington. Mr. Hamry has aided materially in building up the north side and has ever been an active business man.

The people of the Red River Valley are noted for their longevity. They are so accustomed to asking for an extension that they generally get it.

41 W. T. SPILLANE.

Chas. Langevin has been in West Superior during the past week and speaks enthusiastically of that booming town. The Red Lake Falls people now there are doing well. Mr. Langevin may decide to move there in the spring.

The farmers alliance of Red Lake Falls instructed their delegates to St. Paul to work for county division among the legislators whom they might meet at the convention. The farmers are taking a deep interest in the matter of division. They recognize the fact that they have peen paying tribute to Crookston long enough. Their Caesar will no longer be Cookston, but they will render to themselves the things which are theirs and one of those things is a county seat at Red Lake Falls. Let the good work go on; and convince Crookston that the time has come when the people require county division.

Miss Maria Ralph visited in Grand Forks Saturday and Sunday.

Every democrat who has read James G. Blaine's letter submitting the recommendations of the international American conference, feels that he nas read one of Cleveland's tariff speeches.

How much better would it be for the welfare of Polk county district schools if the election of Superintendent were decided by a vote of the county commissioners. Most of them are men of good judgment and their choice would fall no doubt upon a man with sufficient amount of ability to conduct the schools in a becoming manner e'en though he did not stand with his two feet upon the alliance platform. It's an old saying that "like begets like" and so long as the Supt of school is elected by the popular vote just so long may we expect to have the scum of partisan politics covering the whole surface of our educational institutions. If there was a law requiring certain qualifications for nominees the popular vote would then be cast for qualified men. As it is the farmer nominates the farmer regardless o his ability, and swallows his ignorance with an exultation akin to the whoop of victory. The democrats, true to their hops and barley principle, put up a red-nosed figure head who by accident may be elected to preside over the destiny of the common school. The republicans generally pick out an educated politician while the prohibitionists endorse the unknown quantity. 'Tis party, not individual ability that wins. Would it not be better for the state to have a board of examiners before whom should appear every candidaie for the high office and have his merits tested before he be allowed to ask the suffrage of the people. Until the law says you must have this or that qualification before you can hold the office of superintendent of schools, we will have a proper right to look with ridicule upon the common school system—of Polk county.

If the republican party cannot give us a revision of the tariff downward, give us reciprocity with Latin America. Anything to broaden our markets and give the farmer a good price for everything he can raise. The advent of reciprocity will be hailed with delight.

Cattle, in Northern Minnesota, although the price is increasing, is a sort of drug on the market—this is owing undoubtedly to a want of cheap transportation.

If there is backbone enough about the legislature the coming session to hoist the school question out of politics so far as to designate qualification allowing the superintendents to be elected at a special election, the common schools of our state will be the gainer thereby.

Sugar on the free list—price same as ever.

A Madison dispatch says Gov. Hoard has the grip. It certainly isn't a grip on the gubernatorial chair but may possible be on his carpet bag—about the only grip the governor now has.

Since protection has been placed on farm poducts, the Candians are looking for a new market. Since the McKinley bill went into effect 30,000 head of cattle have been shipped to Scotland from the British Northwest a market never before thought of, says the Vancouver daily advertiser.

Mr. John LaBree is down from Thief River to-day with a load of beef. Mr. Labree is one of the best farmers in Polk County, and owns a portion of Thief River townsite.

The Annihilation of the Auk.

Everybody knows the history of the great auk's extermination. A single shell of one of its eggs without the contents was sold at auction for $1,500. And yet this bird was found on Funk island, off the Newfoundland coast, sixty years ago in numbers that were simply countless. But the people from the mainland used to go over to the island in summer and kill them by myriads to eat and for their feathers. They were very appetizing roasted, and were so fat that they served for fuel also, so that half a dozen great auks did to cook a meal of their brethren for dinner

The result of this was that forty years back the last of these interesting fowls perished, and there is no longer one of them in existence. The Smithsonian has practically a corner on their bones. A while ago the institution sent a distinguished osteologist, Professor Lucas, to Funk island for the purpose, and he brought back nearly a barrelful of such remains. If you want a skeleton now you will have to send to Washington for it, and it will cost you about $600.—Rene Bache's Letter.

Humor in a Beanery.

In one of those all night restaurants where the succulent fruit of the beanstalk is deftly served by muscular Ganymedes to a public with an equal muscular digestion humor of a grim, remorseless order occasionally asserts itself. It was the hour when the brawny cup bearers were busily engaged in bringing out the relays of heavy crockery to meet the rush of the midnight attack, with broad triangles of "hickory" pie or the round ring shot crullers. Above the roar of battle there suddenly rang out the clarion tones of a muscular servitor as he glanced about for a stray spoon. Seeing none at hand he turned to the steaming sanctuary at the rear, where the esculatory gods were at work, and in thunderous tones broke forth with, "Hey, Jimmie, bring out der silverware!"—New York Times.

A Snake from the Clouds.

A snake story which has the novelty of being true comes from Lackawaxen, Pa. Courtney Kenneally devotes considerable time to the gun and rod, being proficient in the use of both.

A few days ago Kenneally saw a huge hen hawk flying over the house, and taking quick aim sent a charge of duck shot into the bird. It fell almost at his feet, and his astonishment was great at finding in its talons a rattlesnake measuring 3 feet 8 inches. The snake was alive, but Kenneally quickly dispatched it, and kept the wings of the bird and the skin of the "rattler" as "trophies of the chase."—New York Herald.

Carbolic Treatment for Ants.

A new and valuable practical application of carbolic acid has been made in Central America, where it has been used with gratifying success against the leaf cutting ants, whose ravages upon cultivated trees in that country are so destructive. The acid is mixed with water and poured down the ant burrows, whereupon the ants desert their abode, and by persistent resort to this method of attack they may be expelled from the neighborhood of cultivated plants.—Exchange.

The Bacteriological institute, of Vienna, has been conducting experiments on dirt taken from finger nails, and seventy-eight examinations have been made. The process was to put the dirt in "cultivating mixtures," such as are used for supplying germs with food on which to develop. The crop that grew from the germs in the dirt was a varied one, and included thirty-six kinds of micrococci, eighteen of bacilli and many others.

Signs of Preparation.

Along the New England seaboard the fisher folk are apt to be negligent in the care of their teeth, and the natural result is that they lose them while still young. It is said to be one of the recognized preparations for marriage in some of the fishing villages for the bride elect to be provided with a set of artificial teeth.

Not only in New England, but in other places as well, young people who are contemplating matrimony do not always hasten to inform their parents of their plans. But the old folks everywhere learn to "put this and that together."

Not long ago a lady who has a cottage on the Maine coast said to a "native" to whom she had given more or less employment:

"When is your son Charles to be married? He has been engaged to Jessie for two or three years, hasn't he?"

"Yes," the mother replied, "they've been engaged now for goin' on four year; an' I kind o' suspect that there's somethin' goin' on. I don't know as they 's goin' to be married, but Jess 's had all her teeth out, so I shouldn't wonder a bit if they was."—Youth's Companion.

Costly Silk Underwear.

Mr. Herman Oelrichs has long borne a reputation of being a faultlessly dressed man. He is addicted to the wearing of silk underwear, as, indeed, is every man who can afford to buy it, and for the matter of that a good many who can't. It is actually surprising to see how beautifully some young fellows manage to dress on salaries ranging from $1,500 to $3,000 a year. Not only is the outer man beautifully attired, but in seven out of ten the finest of silk and the sheerest of linen will be beneath.

When one remembers that the cheapest of men's silk underwear costs $10 a suit, and that only an ordinarily fine one can be bought for $35 a set, and that any fellow with pretensions to dress, let alone cleanliness, must have at least six, one wonders what system of mathematics the fifteen hundred dollar a year young man pursues to make ends meet. The statisticians who figure that a young man can live comfortably and even elegantly on $5 a week do not include silk underwear in their calculations.—New York Press.

In a Japanese Mint.

There are about 800 hands employed at the mint of Yeddo, Japan. When the men enter in the morning they are made to divest themselves of their own clothes and put on others belonging to the mint. At the end of a day's work a gong sounds, when the somewhat curious spectacle is presented of 800 men springing from the ground on which they have been seated, throwing off their clothes and rushing, a naked throng, to one end of the yard.

Here they pass through the following ordeal in order to prove that they have no silver on them: Their back hair is pulled down and examined, they wash their hands and hold them up to view, they drink water and then hallo, and lastly they run to the other end of the yard, clearing two or three hurdles on their way, after which performance they are allowed to go to their lodgings.—Chicago Tribune.

Firmness.

During the revolutionary war in America two soldiers of the army of Lord Cornwallis went into a house and acted in a most shameful manner. A third soldier met them coming out and recognized them. He was in no way to blame, but since he declined to give up the names of his comrade he was sentenced to the punishment they had incurred. Lord Cornwallis rode up to him when on the gallows. "Campbell," he said, "what a fool you are to die thus! Give up their names!" "You are in an enemy's country, my lord," was the firm reply, "and you can better spare one man than two." And he was hanged.—San Francisco Argonaut.

READ EACH INSTALLMENT!

In England the badger—a somewhat different animal from the American badger, though like him in many respects—is still hunted by gentlemen by way of "sport." Dogs are especially trained to hunt badgers, and the sport has the peculiarity that it must be enjoyed at night. Between 11 at night and 2 in the morning, when the badger sallies forth from his hole in pursuit of his game, the sportsmen go in pursuit of him.

Gle J. Johnson, clerk of Wandotte tp., made us a pleasant call Saturday.

Some republican papers think that by tariff education the people may be enlightened enough within the next two years to have republican victory perch upon their banner. We believe that by a transposition of the biblical phrase the case of the Minnesota farmer can be briefly stated, i. e.—What doth it profit a man if he gain the whole vote and suffer the loss of his trousers. He certainly won't have these if the McKinley bill is in force a year or two.

Fortunate People.

The LONDON TIMES says—and all lawyers know it to be true—that the more than half a billion dollars of unclaimed fortune in England Ierland Scotland and Wales belong to people in America whose forefathers emigrated from the old country. There are also large fortunes of the same class in Germany and other Eurpean countries. We have gained a number of such claims and have several in hand now which we expect to gain. If your ancestors came from across the sea write us all you know about it and inclose 25 cents for a reply. We charge nothing for investigating and if you have a good claim we will attend to it on very reasonable terms.

Improved Passenger Service

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O. Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7:45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicag to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

Happy New Year.

Yes we hope it will be a Happy New Year to all—and certainly there can be only good in good wishes. The year of Grace, 1890, is almost gone. Like all else in human life, it has been rather "mixed." Sometimes we "caught on," and everything "came our way." On other occaisions we bet our money on wrong hoeses and were sadly left. Sometimes wa have had lots of fun and at other times we hane found this to be a "hard and cruel world." We have made some new friends and lost some old ones. We made lots of hay, but our potatoes were few in a hill, and small at that. If we should strike a balance, we should find that on the whole we are considerably ahead—more sweet than bitter. For itself, "The Burlington" has done pretty well this year, thank you, an rejoyces in the acquaintance of many new patrons, while the old ones are still with us. Thankful for the past, we are yet more hopeful for the future—and in the future when traveling by rail, take "The Only." A Brave Texas Girl.

A telegram from San Antonio, Tex., of November 8, gives this remarkable story of frontier bravery, the heroine being Pauline Collier, sixteen years old of Childress, a new town in the Panhandle country, this State. She is a pupil in the Childress district school and, although she lives ten miles from that town, makes the trip back and forth each day on a spirited Texas pony. One morning she left home at an early hour, and was riding leisurely along when she espied an enormous catamount (zoologically termed the North American tiger) immediately in front of her, crouched in the short prairie grass, ready for a fatal spring. With admirable presence of mind Miss Collier seized the lariat hanging at her saddle bow, and with great dexterity the animal's neck was encircled by the deadly coil. At a word from its mistress the pony which Miss Collier rode sprang away at a gallop, dragging the savage but helpless monster to death. Upon becoming satisfied that the savage brute's life was extinct the youn glady untied the rope from the pommel of her saddle leaving the beast stretched upon the prairie behind her. Proceeding on her way to school, she met several cowboys and related her story. They went to the spot where the dead panther lay and stripped off its hide, which will be made into a robe and presented to the courageous girl. The panther weighed 210 pounds.

TROOPS HEMMED IN.

Reports That Two Companies in the Yellowstone are Surrounded by Indians.

Gen. Miles Discredits the Reports But Sends Reinforcements to the Scene.

RAPID CITY, S. D., Dec. 24.—A report has reached Gen. Miles via Missoula that two companies of soldiers in the Yellowstone region are surrounded north of Cave Hills by 500 or 600 Indians and have sent couriers out with notification of danger to the settlers. Gen. Miles says there are Indians in that vicinity, but discredits the report that the troops are hemmed in. He has, however, ordered reinforcements sent.

Dispatches to Gen. Miles from Col. Sumner to-day show that nearly all of Sitting Bull's followers together with Big Foot's band have surrendered to him. Col. Sumner in a dispatch says this disposes of all the Indians along the Cheyenne river, and if there are any more of Sitting Bull's people out he does not know where they can be.

Gen. Brooke reports the arrival of friendly Indians at the Bad Lands camp and says the capture of Sitting Bull's people and Big Foot's Forces will aid the efforts of the friendlies to bring in the hostiles. An Indian scout reports to Gen. Brooke that Short Bull's followers are anxious to come in, but are withheld by the threats of Kicking Bear, one of Sitting Bull's agents. The scout thinks, however, that the friendlies will at last succeed in bring out Short Bull's followers.

The report is that there are about 3,000 Indians, including women and children, who are badly armed, coming on to join those in the Bad Lands. There are about 600 fighting men among them. This report is thought to be somewhat exaggerated, as there are thought to be not over 300 fighting men among them.

ONE GOOD INDIAN.

The Results of One Day's Skirmishing by a Company of Rangers.

DENVER, Dec. 24.—A News special from Hart's ranch, near the Bad Lands, says that last night news was brought in that the rangers on Coal Draw, near Battle creek, killed an Indian, and that he, with others, was trying to set fire to a ranch belonging to a man named Thompson. This report was verified this morning.

About 170 Indians from the Cheyenne agency are known to be coming to Short Bull and Kicking Bear's people in the Bad Lands. Gen. Carr's, Col. Sumner's and other large forces are now out to intercept them before they reach the Bad Lands, and a report of their capture is momentarily expected. Should they make any resistance, a fight will take place. It is reported that there are about 500 Indians nearing the hostile camp who are going to make a strong effort to bring them in, but no success is expected from this move.

It is certain that there are now enough troops around the Indians to compel their absolute surrender. Two companies of the Seventeenth infantry, comprising over 100 men, reported to Gen. Carr to-day, also forty-six Cheyenne Indian scouts reported which now brings the strength of this command up to over 700 men. A decisive movement of some kind or another with a skirmish with these Indians is momentarily expected.

GATHERING THEM IN.

Sitting Bull's Band of Hostiles Rounded Up by Troops.

At Gen. Ruger's headquarters yesterday it was reported that the band of Sioux under Big Foot had surrendered to Col. Sumner. This latter officer has been in camp on the Cheyenne, near the mouth of Belle Fourche, and marched from there to Cherry creek, where Big Foot's band was captured. Among the prisoners were several of Sitting Bull's band of hostiles.

Advices from Fort Bennett state that Capt. Hurst and Lieut. Hale have captured about forty of Sitting Bull's scattered band, and are taking them to that post.]

CONFIRMED BY GEN. MILES.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 24.—Maj. Gen. Schofield has received a telegram from Gen. Miles, dated Rapid City, S. D., Dec. 22, as follows:

"I believe all or very nearly all the followers of Sitting Bull have been captured. Col. Sumner reports to-day the capture of Big Foot's band of Sioux, numbering 150. He has been one of the most defiant and threatening. The result so far has been satisfactory."

Nothing Serious Before Spring.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Dec. 24.—"If any serious trouble is had with the Sioux," said Senator Moody after he had read the dispatches in this morning's papers, "it will come in the spring. I do not think there will be anything serious now during the winter. The greatest fear is from scattering raiding bands. One of the most serious effects of the whole business will be seen when spring comes, and farmers are kept from their farms through fear of their lives. That will be a bad thing all round."

SITTING BULL'S DEATH.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 24.—In the house today Representative Blanchard of Louisiana offered the following preamble and resolutions:

"Whereas, The recent killing of the Indian chief, Sitting Bull, appears to have been accomplished under circumstances recognized neither by the laws of war nor those of peace;

"Resolved, That a committee, consisting of five members of this house who are members-elect to the house of representatives of the Fifty-second congress, to be appointed by the speaker of the present house, is directed to inquire into and investigate the killing of the said Indian chief, Sitting Bull, and the immediate causes leading thereto, and whether a state of war existed which justified his summary taking off, and, if not, what justification, if any, there was for his violent death at the hands of Indian police in the employ of the government."

That the committee is charged with the duty of investigating the threatened Indian outbreak in the West and the causes thereof, whether neglect by the government of its treaty obligations with the Indians or the tardy or inadequate fulfillment of such obligations on the part of the government had anything to do with the turbulent state of affairs existing among the Indians.

That the committee shall have power to appoint subcommittees and to travel from point to point as may be necessary, and in doing so it is authorized to use government conveyances and means of transportation.

That the committee may sit during the present session and after the final adjournment of the present congress, and shall make report by the 1st of December next to the Fifty-second congress.

Representative McAdoo offered a resolution calling on the secretaries of war and of the interior for all official correspondence relating to the killing of Sitting Bull, and more especially for the reports of those officers and agents directly concerned in ordering or effecting the arrest of Sitting Bull.

BLAINE WILL RECOMMEND.

A Coming Communication to Congress on the Behring Sea Difficulty.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Dec. 24.—Secretary Blaine has prepared a communication to congress on the Behring sea seal-catching question. He will send it to the capitol as soon as it can be laid before Lord Salisbury, as it would be a breach of diplomacy to make it public here in advance of the time when Salisbury sees it.

This message, it is semi-officially announced, will suggest that some active and immediate steps be taken toward arbitrating the questions involved with the British authorities. Since the report of Prof. Elliott, recently published, that the seal were rapidly disappearing, Mr. Blaine's position that the poaching by British vessels was contra bonos mores is to an extent proven correct. It is expected that Mr. Blaine will recommend the appointment of a commission to investigate the seal fishing question to substantiate or refute the statements in Prof. Elliott's report, and at the same time to arbitrate the entire question with the proper representatives of her majesty's government. It is expected that Mr. Blaine's message will be sent to congress early in January.

THE TROUBLESOME CHINESE.

A New Point Which May Cause the Whole Country Vexation.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 24.—For some time past it has been the practice of the treasury department to return to China at government expense all Chinese laborers convicted of entering our territory in violation of the Chinese exclusion act. This applied to Chinamen smuggled over the Mexican and Canadian borders, as well as those coming direct from China.

A recent decision by Judge Maxey, of the United States district court of the Western district of Texas, however, will, if sustained, compel a material modification of this practice. It is that the government has no right under the law to send to China Chinese laborers who enter the United States from contiguous countries, unless the evidence is produced that they came from China, or in other words, that the language of the law authorizing their return "to the country whence they came" should in such cases be construed to mean the contiguous country and not China. Secretary Windom and Assistant Secretary Spaulding are considering the matter.

THE HASTINGS & DAKOTA GRANT.

"Dar" Hall Puts the Case to Mr. Noble Very Politely.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Dec. 24.—Representative Hall was to-day promised by the secretary of the interior department an early settlement of the Hastings & Dakota land grant. He went to Secretary Noble about the matter, and again stated how many settlers were unable to determine whether they owned the land they were on and had been for many years deprived of title to lands which they should have.

During the conversation Mr. Hall incidentally stated that the secretary had promised him an appointment on one of the many Indian commissions, an appointment that had failed to materialize. "Now," said the Third district man, "you can do something for me and do it now. There is no pending legislation to prevent this adjustment, and it is merely a matter of doing on your part." The secretary was rather pleased with the blunt request, and promised to set the machinery in motion to accomplish what was asked.

With Parnell to the Last.

CHICAGO, Dec. 24.—"Irish-Americans in mass meeting, 6,000 strong, stand greeting. Victorious or vanquished in North Kilkenny, we are with you to the last." That was the message a rousing big meeting in Battery D to-night ordered cabled to Parnell. The enthusiasm displayed was phenomenal even for a Celtic gathering. Every mention of Parnell's name brought wild outbursts of applause.

At a meeting of railroad strikers held in this city to-day the announcement was made that 4,500 men had quit work. There is an absolute cessation of freight traffic, and only a few passenger trains are running. The railway managers are making a firm stand against the strikers. The latest report is that the strike is extending. One instance is reported of a locomotive being derailed, it is supposed, by strikers. The secretary of war to-day transmitted to the senate a preliminary of the board on gun factories and steel forging for high power guns, appointed by the president under an act of the last session of congress. In a letter accompanying the report Secretary Proctor states that it may be advisable to establish at no distant day a gun factory at some point on the Pacific coast of sufficient capacity to supply the guns required for the armament of that coast.

HOUSE.

After a long debate the house passed the apportionment bill without amendment—years, 187, nays, 82.

Acting Secretary Chandler, of the interior department, in the absence of Secretary Noble, has sent to Speaker Reed a copy of the letter which Indian Commissioner Morgan addressed to the secretary, urging the passage of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indian bill. The Indian commissioner in his letter describes the destitute condition of the Indians at the Sisseton agency, and explains that owing to the fact that this bill was pending last session no appropriation was made for the maintenance of the Sisseton Indians. Both the Commissioner and Secretary Noble urge that something be done immediately looking to the passage of this bill.

Thursday December 18.

SENATE.

Mr. Sherman, from the committee on finance, reported a bill providing against a contraction of the currency, which was printed and recommitted.

The elections bill was then taken up, and Mr. Coke addressed the senate in opposition to it.

The bill was then laid aside, and after passing a few local appropriation bills, the senate went into executive session.

HOUSE.

The senate bill was passed amending the interstate commerce act by providing for the taking of depositions for notories public. After considerable wrangling the house went into committee of the whole, Mr. Burrows, of Michigan, in the chair.

Mr. Farquhar then moved that the house proceed to the consideration of the senate bill to place the American merchant marine on an equality with that of other nations. Mr. Springer made the point of order that the motion was not in order, but that the committee must proceed to the consideration of appropriation bills. The chairman ruled that the motion was in order for the reason that the rules gave the committee authority to decide what measure it would take up.

Friday December 19.

SENATE.

Mr. Stanford addressed the senate on the bill to increase the circulating medium. At the conclusion of his speech the bill was referred to the committee on finance. Senate bill to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North at Drayton, N. D. was reported and placed on the calendar. Also senate bill appropriating $75,000 for a public building at Fresno, Cal.

HOUSE.

The indications are that the subsidy tonnage bill will pass the house and the outcome may be a bill for mail subsidy merely between this country and the South and Central America states. Like all such indefinite measures no reliable estimate of the cost can be made.

Saturday December, 20.

The house concurred in all the senate amendments to the urgent deficiency bill except the amendment providing for the payment of senate session employes, including the clerks to senators. The committee on appropriations recommended the concurrence in the amendment, with an amendment striking out the appropriation for the senate clerks, which virtually made them annual employes.

Monday December 22.

SENATE.

HOUSE.

Wounded in a General Row.

MOUNT VERNON, Ky., Dec. 22.—At Bush Creek, nine miles east of this place, on Friday evening, five persons were wounded in a general row. Jack Baker received a ball in the left breast, ranging upward and lodging under that shoulder blade; Andy, Mason had his wrist shattered from a ball; a son of Mason got a furrow plowed across his head just over the left ear; John Anglin received a similar wound, and Anglin's wife was shot in the back. How the fight came up no one here has yet been able to learn. All the participants are related by marriage to each other.

THE NORTHWEST.

A Summary of the Important Events of the Week in the Northwestern States.

MINNESOTA.

Reliable parties from the Sisseton reservation assert that Indians are actually starving. Sickness, arising from hunger and cold, is prevailing to an alarming extent.

Teams have now commenced crossing Lake Pepin on the ice. No attempt of the kind has been made on the river at Red Wing as yet, as the ice is hardly thick enough to bear a person.

Two burglars broke into Bone's jewelry shop at Hinkley, taking twenty-six watches and a lot of chains. They were caught in a box car at Mission Creek and the watches found on them.

The jury in the somewhat celebrated libel suit of George La Fond of Little Falls against C. Parker McClure of St. Cloud an alleged libelous letter, for which the former asked $10,000 damages, returned a verdict of $150 for the plaintiff.

E. B. Brekke, a farmer of the town of Aastad, was thrown from a wagon on his way home from Little Falls. He struck on his head and broke his neck. Brekke was middle-aged and well to do, and he leaves a large family.

Coroner Diessner was summoned from Waconia to Norwood to hold an inquest on the body of August Loesch, a saloon-keeper, who hanged himself. Family troubles are ascribed as the cause. He was a member of the G. A. R.

A crazy man named Ole Erickson set fire to Fred Schacht's barn in the town of Elizabeth and it burned to the ground. The loss is $600; insured. Erickson afterwards broke into Schacht's house and tried to fire that, but was caught and has been committed to the asylum.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Salisbury of Lac qui Parle, probably the oldest married couple in the United States, have just celebrated the 103d birthday of Mr. Salisbury. His wife will be 101 years old Christmas day. Jan. 12 they will have been married eighty years.

Martin and Joseph Madden, who were arrested in St. Paul charged with burglarizing the hardware store of J. W. Powell in St. Cloud Oct. 19, pleaded guilty in the district court to burglary in the third degree. Martin was sentenced to two and one-half years in the state prison and Joseph was sentenced to the St. Cloud reformatory.

E. J. Amery, a well-known contractor, was murderously assaulted in his office at Duluth by John Haas, a discharged laborer, who fired three shots at him, perforating his clothing, but inflicted no wound. Haas then placed the revolver close to his own left temple and sent a bullet into his brain. Haas was subject to fits of insanity. He was unmarried, and thirty-five years old.

The Iowa, Minnesota & Dakota Elevator company, operating a line of warehouses on the Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern railway, has assigned. Liabilities, $150,000; assets unknown. John Butler, banker of Elisworth, was manager of the company. Two days ago special trains were run on the Burlington road and all the grain taken from the elevators to Chicago and disposed of.

Engineer Russell has started out from Duluth with a party to make surveys locating the Aticokan Iron Range railway from Carlstadt ninety miles west and from Aticokan river about fifty miles. On the completion of this road, which will virtually be a branch of the Canadian Pacific, 1,000,000 tons of ore per annum can easily be shipped from the Aticokan mines.

An almost successful attempt at jail delivery was made at Breckenridge. One of the prisoner's under sentence to Stillwater for robbery got a bail from a water pail, picked the lock, got two cells open and the three, all under sentence to state prison, got the irons off their feet and when discovered were making good progress with a hole through the wall. Aid was called in and the men gotten back into their cells and secured.

In the district court at Albert Lea, Tracy Baumgartner, a young woman well know in that city, obtained a verdict for $5,000 against John Graham, formerly a saloon-keeper, now living at Ottumwa, Io., for defamation of character. He was accused, in effect, of calling her a woman of the town. He is insolvent and the verdict is uncollectable. He made a very weak defense, and seemed to care little about it. The verdict, nevertheless is a surprise to many, but it was justified by the evidence.

NORTH DAKOTA.

It is said that there is not a lawyer in the legislature of this state and 90 per cent. of that body are farmers.

Col. Pat Donan has got back to Fargo. It is said he will again do editorial work on the Argus.

In anticipation of the meeting of the legislature Bismarck's electric lights have been turned on again.

It has been suggested that if the Indians could be interested in state politics the ghost dance and the war path would no longer have charms for them.

The Grand Forks, Herald says: "Up here it is still a question as to the advisability of increasing the tax levy above 4 mills. South Dakota's limit is 2 mills, but this state's constitution fixes 4 mills as the limit."

The elevator of the North Dakota company burned at Elliott with about 12,000 bushels of wheat, which was being cleaned at the time. It is thought that the fire started from sparks from the smokestack, the wind being very high at the time. The building was soon destroyed. Both the building and contents were insured.

Hon. W. M. Budge of Grand Forks, and Miss Minnie Grow were married at the residence of the bride's parents. The bride is the only daughter of one of the best families in the city. The acquaintance that led to this union was formed while the bride was serving as a teacher of languages in the public schools of Grand Forks. The couple go Chicago and may perhaps visit some Southern cities on their wedding tour.

The case of Howland vs. Brunell has occupied the attention of the district court at Fargo. It was brought by Howland to recover $1,500 which he alleged Mrs. Brunell stole from his buggy while he was taking breakfast at her farm south of the city. The case throughout has been highly sensational, and attracted a large attendance each day. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant.

"Yesterday was the 13th of December," says the Fargo Argus, "and here in Fargo we sat with fires out and windows thrown open. No balmier airs ever breathed over Araby the Blest, no bluer skies ever bent their sapphirean arch above the Neapolitan bay, and no more glorious sunshine ever poured its golden flood of radiance upon the rose-beds of Elysium." Pat Donan has gone back to Fargo, sure enough.

The Indian scare at New Rockford, an account of which was published throughout the country, turns out to have been a hoax. Eight or ten friendly Indians appeared close to town and put up a tepee. A practical joker started the story that there were at least fifty Indians, and that they were on the war path. Residents of New Rockford are as safe from Indian depredations and their scalping knives as are the citizens of either of the Twin Cities.

News comes from McLean county of a terrific encounter between farmers named Haugheberg and Peterson and three wildcats, which scented fresh blood of the deer the hunters had killed. The wildcats followed the men, and pounced upon them unawares. Both were shockingly lacerated and their clothes torn from their bodies, but after a hard struggle the animals were killed. When found the men were unable to move.

A very enthusiastic state convention was held at Grand Forks, and an organization perfected to commence work to secure a magnificent exhibit for the state at the world's fair. Officers elected are: President, George E. Bowers of Hillsboro; secretary, A. C. Labrie of Grand Forks; treasurer, L. E. Booker of Bismarck; vice presidents, Joseph Toombs of Grafton, S. C. Roberts of Fargo, William Lloyd of Jamestown, Oscar Will of Bismarck, Thomas Elliott of Lisbon, Warren Steele of Rolla. A board of directors, consisting of one number from each county, and an executive committee of nine are yet to be appointed.

Miss Linda W. Slaughter announces that she will start a daily paper in Bismarck next month. She says; "It isn't going to be a Sunday-school paper, either, although I believe in religion, labor reform, Farmer's alliance and protection. There isn't going to be any politics in it either, so it won't interfere with any of the excellent papers already here, and anyway I am sure our editors are all too magnanimous to frown down a woman's journalistic enterprise. It is purely a business venture started for business purposes. I am at home in the journalist's profession and have no business talent, so why should not I succeed as well as mother?"

SOUTH DAKOTA.

An old-fashioned circular wolf hunt is proposed for Christmas at Blunt.

A vein of coal has been struck at Winnebago agency, forty-five feet below the surface.

Preparations are being made at Pierre for a grand inaugural ball at the Locke house on January 6, when the legislature convenes.

The Brookings Register says: "The bankers of this city state that there are fewer mortgage foreclosures at present than during any previous year in the history of the county; also that many are redeeming their real estate sold under foreclosure a year ago."

A. B. Holmes, near Wessington who is experimenting with beet culture, tells the St. Lawrence Journal that although his sugar beets were badly affected by dry weather, he got sixty bushels from what he figured to be less than one-twentieth of an acre. This is at the rate of over 1,200 bushels per acre.

The form of the jurat in the application for admission to the South Dakota Soldier's home has been changed. Heretofore an applicant for admission had to swear that he was destitute and had no means of support. Instead he now simply swears that he desires to avail himself of the privileges of the home.

On a late trip to town from his Little Castle Creek ranch, Joe Reynolds told the Rapid City Republican a story of the finding of two skeletons, one of a man, the other of a bear, lying together, near the head of Little Rapid Creek. The find was made by a party of hunters about a month ago. An old rusted hunting knife was also found near the spot. These are no doubt all that remain to tell the tale of a terrible forest tragedy of many years ago.

"Our eastern friends believe our Indian yarns readily enough," says the Pierre Free Press of the 12th, "but if we should tell them about our delightful Indian summer weather and how plowing is going on just as though it was the month of May, they would fall down on their marrow bones and pray 'Lord have mercy on those miserable Dakota liars!' However, two dozen plows are busy right here in Pierre turning over dirt where street grading is being done."

WISCONSIN.

The machinery of the Neenah wall paper mill has been tested with satisfactory results. The mill will begin operations soon.

A man named Tomsvie accidently shot himself in one of McCrossen's camps at Giles, Ashland County. The injuries, though serious, are not fatal, and with good care it is thought he will recover.

Maggie Femal married Neal Bresney at Appleton contrary to parental wishes. When she went to ask forgiveness the old man drove the couple off with a horse pistol. He afterwards repented his act and forgave them.

The government has a force of men at work at Rapide de Croche, near Appleton, where the lock will be repaired this winter. Coffer dams are being constructed above and below the lock so that the water may be pumped out and a new bottom put in.

Frederick Thalheim, a resident of the town of Friendship, met death in a peculiar manner. While in a stable a colt jumped forward and kicked him in the chest. Dr. Bishop could find no marks or bruises, but death was caused by a rupture of some organs of the heart.

Bart B. Scott, late treasurer of Ashland county, died at Hot Springs, Ark. He had been suffering from poor health for some time. At the most critical time of his illness news came from Ashland that his official affairs were in bad shape. An investigation proved that the cash was not on hand to meet the demands of the county. It is said that he had used the money of the county in his business transactions, confident of his ability to replace it.

IOWA.

The bursted bank of Fontanelle received deposits up to the hour of closing its doors. There is indignation against one of the bank's officials.

At a late meeting of fruit growers in Muscatine, Elmer Reeves answered the question. "Are there white blackberries?" He said that when the bushes laid on the ground and the berries ripened in the grass they might be white.

John Smith, an Illinois visitor, was knocked down and robbed of a gold watch and $5 in open day on a Davenport street. A few minutes later one of the robbers returned Smith's watch to him in consideration of $5. Jack Mageo and Tom Terrill, the latter a graduate from the penitentiary did the job, and are under arrest.

The grand jury of Polk county has indicted Walter Roan for assault with intent to kill Ira Perkins. He stabbed Perkins in the neck October 31 and the injury has caused a partial loss of Perkins' power of speech. The provocation for the assault was that Perkins took Roan's divorced wife to the theater.

Unwilling Movers.

It is a well known fact that many people find the last day of April the most convenient time for moving to their summer homes at the seashore or in the country, although the suggestion that this has anything to do with the rate of taxation in the two places where they own houses would undoubtedly be repudiated with scorn by many of the movers.

There are some people, however, who receive suggestions of that kind with a half hidden smile, and there are others actually bold enough to say that they prefer country taxes to those of the city. There is one man in New England who has learned to reduce his taxes to the lowest possible figure, even at considerable inconvenience to himself.

He owns a farm, which is only remarkable from the fact that it is in two states, instead of one. To make the most of this peculiar advantage he has built his house with its south side in one state and its north side in the other, while the passer through his front door can have a foot in each state without the slightest trouble.

A fence on the opposite side of the road marks the boundary line. In the field which it surrounds in one state are numerous hen houses, large and comfortable for their inhabitants. Close to the fence in the other state is a row of loosly built, untidy looking hen houses, into which the protesting hens and chickens are hurried when taxation day comes around, the secret of the change being that hens are taxed in one state and not in the other.—Youth's Companion.

A Thief Detector.

"When we started I noticed," said one of a party of jewelers who had camped in the wilds of Canada, "that one of our number was incumbered with a large box. The second day in camp two watches disappeared, and each member of the party began to look upon the others with silent suspicion. Finally, as the thefts were repeated, a meeting was called, and every man pleaded not guilty. No one up to that time suspected the honest French Canadian lad we had engaged as a servant. He was questioned and also entered a prompt and emphatic denial. We all believed his protestations of innocence except the man with the box.

"'Gentleman,' said he, 'somebody in the party took those watches, and I propose to find out who. I have here a thief detector,' pulling out an electric battery and winking at the crowd. "If there is a thief among us this will point him out.' Every man took his turn at the battery. The boy watched the performance in wonder. He had never seen such a queer arrangement before, but as everybody who touched the coils escaped without harm he stepped bravely to the front when it came to his turn and took hold. A sudden change came over him. The owner of the battery had turned on its full force, and the victim gave a yell of pain and horror, and fell to the ground screaming: "Save me! save me! I took 'em, but I'll never do it again!' "—Jewelers' Weekly.

SINGLE TAX DEPARTMENT.

TAXING LAND VALUES.

[Henry George in N. Y. Standard.]

All taxes which increase prices are necessarily taxes in favor of monopoly, since the more capital it requires to go into any business, or to make any improvement, the smaller the number of those who can do so. And, besides this general characteristic of the taxes we would abolish, many of these taxes are specially designed to foster monopolies. It is, moreover, evident that when a large part of the produce of labor and capital of the community is taken in rent by those who do nothing to aid in production (for land owners as land owners in no wise aid production), there is not merely created an unnecessary and unnatural inequality in the distribution of wealth, but this primary inequality gives rise to a tendency to further inequality. "Unto him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away," is the expression of a universal law. To take from one and give to another is, both by decreasing the relative power of the one and increasing the relative power of the other, to put them upon unequal footings in treating future divisions. If we trace to their cause the majority of great fortunes, we shall find it in monopolies of some kind—the primary and most important of all being the monopoly of the land. It is not because capital gets an undue proportion of the wealth that it helps to produce (though capital in some of its aggregations which involve monopoly does), that, in spite of all the enormous advances which invention and improvement and the growth of population have made, and still are making, in productive power, labor gets but such a scant living, and wages tend constantly to the minimum that will support life. With the advance of the arts and the progress of society, interest—which measures the return to capital—does not increase, but tends rather to diminish. It is rent which goes up, and up, and up. To divert to common uses this great fund which, though drawn from the production of the whole community, now goes to but a portion of the community, would be to turn into a promoter of equality what is now a promoter of inequality. To release capital from taxation, to lift the burden which now rests upon improvement and production, to destroy speculative land values, and throw open land to those who would use it, would open opportunities for labor in every direction and send wages up. In all industries laborers would get a fairer proportion than now of the value their labor creates.

With relation to the factors of production and the primary distribution of the produce, society is divided for purposes of economic investigation into three classes—land owners, capitalists and laborers. Of these it is evident that the change would be to the advantage of the capitalists and laborers, and to the disadvantage of the land owners. But it is only in the abstract that such a distinction can be clearly made in any country, and especially in such a country as ours. We have, it is true, a considerable class of laborers who are neither capitalists nor land owners; but we have few capitalists who are not laborers, for in the economic use of the term the managing head of any great industrial enterprise is as truly a laborer as is any workman in his employ; and we have probably no land owners who are not either laborers or capitalists, for, in the strict definition of the term, buildings and improvements are capital, not land (*). A very great number of our people combine the characters of land owner, capitalist and laborer, and there are certainly a large majority who combine at least two of these characters. Thus, while all would profit in the general social gains, it is only in the character of land owner that against these general gains any one could set individual loss. Therefore, the proposition to concentrate taxes on land values should, as a matter of mere individual interest, commend itself even to land owners whose interests as land owners do not exceed their interests as capitalists or laborers, or both.

With reference to the ownership of land and with regard to actual facts, our people may be divided into three classes—those who own land which they do not themselves use, those who own land which they use, and those who own no land. The latter class may contain some capitalists, but it is mainly composed of laborers—farm hands, manual laborers, operatives, mechanics, clerks, professional men, etc., who depend for their living upon the earnings of their labor. This is the class which it is most important to consider, not merely for sentimental reasons, but because, since they constitute the base of the social pyramid, whatever improves or depresses their condition, will affect all the rest. Now, it is manifest that to take taxes off capital and improvement and production and exchange would be greatly to benefit all of those who live by their earnings, whether of hand or head. It is manifest also that it would benefit all who live partly by the earnings of their labor and partly by the earnings of their capital—store-keepers, merchants, manufacturers, etc.—and that by increasing the net productiveness of capital it would benefit those whose incomes are drawn from capital alone.

Take now the case of those to whom the opponents of the single tax are so fond of referring—the farmers who till their own acres, the men who own their homesteads in which they live. It is true that the change we propose would diminish the selling value of their land (but merely of the bare land, not of the buildings or improvements), and if fully carried out would virtually destroy it. But it would in no wise diminish the usefulness of their land; it would in no wise diminish, but would in fact increase, their incomes. They would pay under this system less taxes than they pay now. The clerk or mechanic or business or professional man who owns a house and lot in which he lives might pay more taxes on his lot than now, but in return for this he would escape the taxes now levied on his house and its contents, and, through the medium of indirect taxation, upon every thing that his family consumes. And so with the farmer. Our present system of taxation falls with peculiar severity upon the farming class. Not only is improved land all over the United States taxed higher than unimproved land of the same quality, but the taxes which so largely raise the prices of all the farmer has to buy do not, and can not, so long as we are exporters of agricultural produce, raise the prices of what the farmer has to sell. And, further than this, to put taxation solely upon land values would shift the weight of taxation from the sparsely settled agricultural districts to those populous centers where land has a real and a high value. As it would destroy the speculative value of land, the result would be that many farmers would have no taxes at all to pay, for, no matter what might be the value of his improvements, no farmer would have more taxes to pay than could be collected from unimproved land equal to his in quality and situation. Manifestly it would be very greatly to the relief of the farmer to abolish all the taxes which now fall upon his improvements and his consumption, and substitute for them a tax upon the value of bare land, which is always higher in populous centers than in agricultural districts, and in sparsely settled agricultural districts hardly exists at all, except as the result of speculation. And from the effects upon the diffusion of population the farmer would greatly gain. Just as the city population would gain from the destruction of the system which now builds tenement houses and vacant lots, so would the agricultural communities gain in productive power and in social enjoyment when settlement should become closer, from the fact that there would no longer be any inducement for any one to take up or hold more land than he could use.

Further than this, it must be remembered that, although the selling price of land would diminish this, since it would affect all land, would not affect the exchange value of the homestead lots or farms. It would be, to the man who wants for himself and his family the security of a home in which to live, or land to cultivate, a purely nominal and intangible loss, to offset which there would be great and actual gains; and, as his children grew up, it would be very much easier for them to get homesteads or farms of their own.

The only people who would really lose would be those whose incomes are mainly drawn from the rent, not of buildings, but of land, and those who are holding land in the expectation of future profit from the high prices that in time those who want to use it will be compelled to pay them for it. But there are few, if any, individuals who belong exclusively to this class. In varying degrees all our large landholders are also capitalists, and would gain as capitalists though they might lose as land owners. And, if in some cases the relative loss exceeded the relative gain, it would only be (and this, if necessary, might be made certain by some provision as to widows, etc.) in the case of those who could readily stand the loss without being really hurt. In any large view it will always be found that the true interests of all individuals coincide with the best interests of society.

[*] Strictly, they are wealth, and may or may not be capital, according to the use to which they are put. But it is not necessary, in an article like this, to draw the distinction between capital and wealth, since under the change proposed all wealth would be relieved from taxation, whether it were merely wealth or also capital—that is to say, whether it were used merely for the gratification of the owner or for productive purposes.

To put all taxes on land values would be to remove all burdens from capital and labor; to free industry, and energy, and thrift from restriction or fine; to take away the incentives to speculation in land, and to throw open natural opportunities to those who would use them, without, as now, compelling them to pay a heavy premium to some non-user. From the freedom of operation which would thus be given to productive forces would result an enormous increase in the production of wealth. The fund from which all incomes must be drawn would be vastly augmented. And at the same time would come a great equalization in distribution; for that freedom of operation which is essential to the largest production of wealth is also essential to its fairest distribution.

To one who has never thought over the matter it may seem preposterous to say that in a simple change in the methods of taxation lies the fundamental cure for pauperism and low wages and all the social difficulties which afflict modern society. Yet, to all who will carefully think over it this will appear. When it is considered what is really involved in the simple change, such great effects do not seem disproportionate to the cause. For, to remove taxation from the production and accumulation of wealth, and to put it on the appropriation of that element which is the raw material of wealth, would be to remove obstructions to the natural play of social forces—obstructions which produce in the social organism just such effects as bandages and ligatures that impeded the circulation of the blood would produce in the human body. It would be to conform our most important social adjustments to the supreme law of justice; for, that the right to land is common and equal while the right to the products of labor is individual and exclusive, are correlative propositions too manifest to need discussion.

It makes one very tired to hear of a farmer struggling under high taxes and a big mortgage opposing the single land tax, which would lift from his shoulders nearly all his present taxation and at the same time double his earnings. Of all others farmers have the most to gain and nothing to lose by an honest system of taxation, but it is hard to convince them of it.—Enterprise, Kansas Anti-Monopolist.

Unequaled opportunities and unequal burdens have made the millionaire and the pauper. An equality in opportunities, privileges and burdens must be established before labor can come by its own.—Detroit Evening News.

THE OLD AND THE NEW.

"And fleeting as the sere and yellow leaf."
"Hail! I come to reign," cried the bright New Year,
"And all the years do find dominion brief."

"Usurper! upstart! dressed in vestments fine?"
"Keep thy temper, brother!" laughed the New Year,
"For ancient styles are somewhat past their prime."

"You've dethroned me!" crossly said the Old Year,
"My broken sceptre in the dust may stay."
"We'll put it by," slyly laughed the New Year,
"To rest (and rust), memento of thy day!"

"My heart is broken!" sighed the dear Old Year,
"Memories rise to taunt me, bitter, sad."
"Nay! they offer dole," whispered the New Year,
"While I with joys arise full-sized and glad."

Toll the bells mournfully for the Old Year;
Snows, gently bequeath him a pall!
Which smiles a fresh hope for us all!

Christmas Games.

If you are to entertain a large circle of young folks of all ages at Christmas, it will be well to provide yourself beforehand with a list of amusing games.

"Fling the Towel:" Let the company form a circle, with one of the players in the center. One member of the circle then flings a large towel, aiming to hit some other member. If the player in the middle is adroit enough to intercept it and catches the towel on its way across the ring, he takes the place of the one who threw it, who then takes his stand in the middle. If it hits the one at whom it is aimed, he must try to get rid of it by throwing it to another player before the one stationed in the middle can catch it.

The game of "Santa Claus," which is not unlike that called "Donkey," is great fun. Tack upon the wall a big white sheet. Make a large paper Santa Claus; cut off his head, his feet, his arms, legs and pack; cut off his ears and nose; cut out his eyes, and paste his body on the sheet. Blindfold each player and give him a portion of the Saint's anatomy, and let him place it where he thinks it should go. You can have a bit of dried mucilage on the backs of these bits of paper, so that they can be moistened and stuck to the body. He generally turns out a most peculiar looking saint with one eye on his heel, another on his thumb, his head where his feet should be, and nothing in the right place. You can have two simple prizes—one for the person who comes nearest being right in the placing of some member, and a booby prize for the farthest out of the way. We have seen a whole roomful of grown people convulsed with merriment over his game.

"Gossip" is amusement for the older ones. All sit in a circle. One communicates a piece of gossip about some person in the room, who proceeds to tell it to the one next, and so it goes on until the last one is to repeat aloud just what he hears, and the starter gives the original sentence. They are generally just about as far apart as the gossip started at a sewing circle is from the same piece of news when it has made the village rounds.

"Metamorphosis:" Let each member of the company be furnished with a sheet of paper and a pencil. Let him draw at the top of the sheet the head of some bird, beast, fish, or human being, and fold down the sheet so as to leave nothing exposed except lines to show on what part of the paper the body is to be placed. He then passes it to his next neighbor, who draws on it a body to suit his own fancy. It is then folded and passed to the next, who must draw legs, two or four. When the papers are examined, some very curious monsters, unknown to natural history, are displayed.

"Apprentice" is not too intellectual for the little ones. One of the players begins by saying, "I have apprenticed my son to a butcher," or dry-goods merchant, or to any tradesman, and gives the initial of the first thing his son sold. The rest must guess what the article sold was, and the one who guesses right must then "prentice" his son.

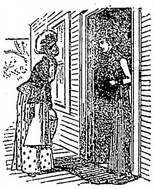
CHRISTMAS MORNING.



A STUDY IN BLACK AND WHITE.

* * *

Half a Loaf.

Mr. Jones—"I've caught you under the mistletoe, Miss Smith, and I'm entitled to a kiss."

Miss Smith,—Oh, I don't believe in such foolish customs; but you may take my veil and press your lips against that portion of it that generally rests on my mouth."

CREOLE AND PURITAN

By T. C. DE LEON,

Author of "Four Years in Rebel Capitals," "Juny," "Cross Purposes."

DEDICATED TO HON. HENRY WATTERSON,
In Memory of Schoolboy Days, Still Unforgotten, as Our Shadows Lengthen
Toward the Sunset.

Copyright, 1890, by J. B. Lippincott Company, and published by arrangement with them.

the air one flash of steel, in right and left cut at rolling "heads;" when the unsteady went down in the sawdust, at imminent risk to limb if not to life, and the hot frenzy of the cavalry charge was mimicked almost to reality, then ever beside the proud, olive face of the Creole was another, pale and placid even, with its steel gray eyes only gleaming under the fair brows that scarcely emphasized the broad white forehead.

For Dale Everett was a born soldier too, carrying in his veins blood that had boiled hot enough under oppression to send his ancestor across seas to set his foot on Plymouth Rock; blood that had later flowed in Indian fight and Revolution; blood that had lately made his clear faced mother point to his grandsire's name, boldly standing out among the signers of "the Declaration," hung in the parlor of the old Massachusetts homestead, as she blessed him in farewell and bade him study and remember what that name demanded of those who bore it. He was a clear type of that "Brahmin caste" of New England which has set its seal upon all her best work—which, in the glow of its pride, fuses conservative [illegible] and supreme steadfastness [illegible] that hardens under [illegible] density and [illegible] hills.

[illegible] in his class for two years [illegible] naturally devoted [illegible] impetuous friend to the [illegible] of cadet life. But duty was his [illegible] and his military record almost equaled Latour's [illegible] performance, while it lacked as [illegible] in brilliancy as [illegible] in scholarship. But in the fencing and riding schools the Yankee boy [illegible] exercise to keep the body vigorous and healthy, spite of the great strain upon the healthy and vigorous mind. And in neither did the debonair Creole find it to meet the match for his most impetuous rashes, when chance placed the cool and steady New Englander opposite his blade, or mounted by his side in the swirl of the charge.

"Do you note the peculiar difference in their riding?" the bluff old commandant once asked Miss Van der Huysen, as he watched with proper veteran's admiration the deeper glow in her eyes that followed them as they swept by, neck and neck. Those eyes, glittering almost to blackness when fixed on the riders, seemed only laughing brown as they looked into the colonel's rather bloodshot ones, and the voice was very quiet in which she answered, slowly:

The colonel made no answer in words; but that night, over his third cigar, he suddenly blurted out to the senior surgeon:

"[illegible] I be sent to the frontier if that Miss Van der Huysen [illegible] to be a troop captain. But [illegible] if I understand her, though!"

And not many men at West Point that summer [illegible] military discipline by knowing more on that score than did the [illegible] officer. To men and women at the hotel, to officers and their wives in quarters, even to the laboriously distant cadets, the girl was courteous and affable always—often brilliant. But under the affability was a something [illegible] repelled familiar approach; and [illegible] of the hotel women, headed by [illegible] mamma of the assistant surgeon, confidentially confessed that they "[illegible] hated her," with no given reason therefor.

But the son of the leader of this anti-Van der Huysen [illegible] was ignorant of its [illegible] frequent [illegible] pride of conquest, he would have had his sword and his [illegible] his own heart, and [illegible] at her feet on the first provocation. But though ready to ape the Cæsar who [illegible] the Egyptian [illegible] the young doctor somehow never found just the opportunity to perfect his triumph. Meanwhile the Hon. Algernon [illegible] possible peer, held [illegible] eager but [illegible] receive [illegible] obedient [illegible] such con[illegible] rather than of [illegible].

"[illegible] you know," his [illegible] confided to Bennie [illegible] everybody's friend [illegible] out how she stands [illegible] But there is something [illegible] you know."

And [illegible] the Hon. Algernon designated the two star [illegible] in wax [illegible] Miss Van der Huysen's manner was quite perfect. Frank and cordial, it never gave hint of [illegible] sisterhood—that favorite cloak to warm cadet [illegible]—and was equally free from suspicion of anything like "an affair" with either.

"They are your property, dear," she said to Bennie, in the quiet of a still hunt for cadets. "I really believe they are both in love with you, though I cannot tell which has the pas." At which impeachment the other's rosy cheeks had become crimson; and her usually saucy eyes, cast earthward, were wholly innocent of the strange gleam that darkened her friend's, though the velvety voice went on without pause or change:

"Either one takes me as vicarious atonement when the other has sailed away in a waltz for the golden fleece. But I shall not enact the daughter of Æetes, for I really like both boys, and find them the only bearable pair of 'white legs' in the entire corps."

[illegible] Bennie ventured in pretty deprecation. "Why, Edith dear, they are both years older than we are. Dale was at Harvard before his appointment, and Mr. Latour was 20 in his second class year."

Miss Van der Huysen smiled with her red lips and white teeth, but her eyes ignored the levity of the lower features, as she slightly emphasized the title:

"Mister Latour is scarcely as matured as 'Dale,' so far as I can judge; and I thought you and he were older friends"—

"The families were," Bennie broke in quickly, with another blush. "But I have known Dale never so long! He's such a brave, true fellow and so smart, isn't he? Adrien's mother and mamma were at school together in Paris; and his grandmother—Madame is the only way any of them ever speak of her—is a perfect model of the old legitimiste one reads about in the Quartier St. Germain."

"And they are immensely rich, are they not?" Edith queried innocently.

"Immensely, I believe; but I never understand the details of those things."

"You are a wonderful little girl, Bennie dear," Miss Van der Huysen rejoined. "I do not wonder that all the men adore you, and that 'only not all' the women praise."

The brown eyes gazed straight into the blue, which fell at the next question:

"The Latour plantations adjoin Mr. Beverly Mason's, do they not?"

"I'm sure I don't know," Bennie answered, with something prettily akin to a pout. "Aunt Tab has that part of Louisiana geography so thoroughly at her fingers' ends that I never studied it."

"Du liebe kind!" laughed Edith. "Truly art thou Elaine of the tower, loving Launcelot for his shield's sake and his doughty arm, not for the jewels of his tourney. And yet, when I had you in town last winter, all the world said Mr. Mason was very"——

"Very—so he was—very kind and nice to me? So he was," Miss Standish broke in, not without a suspicion of petulance. "He's an old, old friend of papa's, closely connected with him in business, and"—

"Here come David and Jonathan, prompt to military time," Miss Van der Huysen interrupted in her turn, her tact telling her more than the other's words. And the prettily contrasted pair rose from the rocks, where they had kept tryst for the young men, and advanced to meet them with that mixture of convenance and school recess freedom which perhaps is the real charm to society of a West Point summer.

Loitering through the grand old walk the couples drifted apart, Dale and Bennie Standish gaining a hundred yards while a refractory shoelace somehow resisted Miss Van der Huysen's firm fingers. And when the graceful head was raised at last, the glorious eyes looked straight through the cadet's, when she said, naturally, as though continuing a subject:

"Had Guinevere been Elaine, do you believe Launcelot would have let his great love outweigh his love and loyalty to the king?"

"Like as not. Launcelot was a ponderous old prig," Latour answered with a laugh. "I have always read between the lines that Guinevere made the pace in the lovemaking and flattered the old boy into belief that he was a genuine lady killer. He was never true knight, though, for all his sword play and horsemanship."

"And why not, pray, Sir Critic?"

"Because false friend could never be true man," the cadet answered. "To have loved the queen truly Launcelot must first have been capable of true friendship to the good natured king who made him friend and knight. He would have acted what the later Briton wrote:

> I could not love thee, dear, so much,
> Loved I not honor more!

Friend, indeed! Why, figure to yourself, if you can, my making love to Dale's wife when we both go to the frontier!"

There was no amusement at the cadet's gush, with its startling transition from many towered Camelot to an Indian reservation, on the face the society girl turned to him.

"And Dale Everett is your Arthur," she said slowly, almost sadly. "You love him with a purer love than you will ever give to woman."

"He is the noblest gentleman God ever made," Latour answered warmly. "As for truly—in earnest, you know—loving some woman that will come perhaps. But that is so different from love for Dale. He is Arthur in greatness of soul, but he is a better man than any fellow could have been who spent his life riding around clad in iron pans, even 'for redressing human wrong.' I tell you, Miss Edith, Dale hasn't his equal on earth! Why, the fellow who could be false to him would be false to his Maker!"

"You are a friend worth having," the girl said warmly. "There is something in your southern sun that warms southern blood as none in our north can warm. I have always felt that I understood you better than—any of them!" She held out her hand frankly. "Ah! what would it not be worth, surrounded by worldlings, or idiots, to have one friendship such as that!"

"But you know you have mine, Miss Edith?" the cadet asked in blundering honesty, but not releasing the slender gant suede while he spoke. "That goes without saying! You must feel that of all the women here—and they are the majority of all I have ever known—you are the most brilliant, the most bewildering. Do you not feel that I prize your friendship far beyond what my awkward way of telling you expresses—that I feel how good it is of you to make me an exception to all the corps?"

The girl had gently withdrawn her hand; but the face she turned toward the breeze tossed Hudson glowed with something nearer kin to a blush than the homage of all the great leaders of her city german had ever called to its olive smoothness.

Longfellow has told of those moments in life when the heart is so full of emotion that a careless word may cause an overflowing splash; and Adrien Latour's was probably brimming, for he went on eagerly, as the girl did not reply:

"But of course you know how I prize it! and so does—Dale."

Edith Van der Huysen never changed a feature; and the excusable smile at the gaucherie of nature in the Creole's peroration did not come to her lips. She still looked riverward as she answered slowly, but without a pause:

"Yes; I believe I understand. And it is very good of you—and Mr. Everett."

Poetry, the riding school, the last hop and like great movements of his little world filled Latour's talk for the remainder of that walk, but somehow, though he had managed to get one foot in the stirrup, Edith would not let him mount the cadet hobby, flirtation. And only as they sighted the guard tent, homeward bound, did she recur to Dale Everett.

"So King Arthur, in this godly Nineteenth century, may ride around the land with Guinevere on his pillion, while never a Launcelot fears she! But what if Wizard Merlin should weave a witch armor, all golden and studded with big solitaires? Will the fair queen be ever the wise queen, and peer through the gemmed visor for truth in the eyes of the graybeard? What say you, Sir Critic?"

"Why, what do you mean?" asked Latour, in genuine mystification.

"Nothing!" Miss Van der Huysen answered, with a little laugh. "Of course you could not understand. I was only 'talking society,' and society never understands itself. Ah, now you must go!"

As she spoke the clear note of assembly for dress parade cut the evening air, and Everett and Bennie Standish, still talking earnestly, hastened across the plain to join them. Edith shot one quick glance into the cadet's eyes—her own seeming to him darker and more luminous than ever before—as she said slowly:

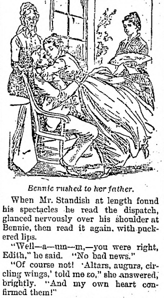
"King Arthur may yet love—Elaine! Hush! I am not asking betrayal of confidence, only stating a possibility. And as for the Lily Maid, she"——

The second bugle note rang out clear, commandful. The other couple joined them, and as the hands of the four crossed, in hurried leavetaking, only Latour caught the low whisper:

"Farewell, Sir Launcelot!"

PART I—CHAPTER III.

IN THE SOCIETY PRIMER.



Bennie rushed to her father.

When Mr. Standish at length found his spectacles he read the dispatch, glanced nervously over his shoulder at Bennie, then read it again, with puckered lips.

"Well—a—um—m,—you were right, Edith," he said. "No bad news."

"Of course not! 'Altars, augurs, circling wings,' told me so," she answered, brightly. "And my own heart confirmed them!"

"You can hear it," Mr. Standish continued. "It reads, 'We passed exams. Appointed today. Adrien gets Cavalry, and I Engineers Will be down noon boat. DALE EVERETT.'"

"Coming here—Today!" Edith uttered the exclamation in natural surprise; and that strange glow of hers—that was never a blush, but a warmth of her whole olive skin—came to the face she turned toward the Hudson, as the light in her eyes deepened and burned.

"Yes, it is—a little—um—m—awkward," the old gentleman replied, half to her and half to his own thought, adding genuinely: "But the boys are always welcome here; and, after all, I'm rather glad. Sister Tabitha! Bennie! here's a surprise for you. West Point assignments are made, and Dale telegraphs he will be down on the next boat."

"Dale coming! Oh, I'm so glad!" Bennie cried, as she turned from her flowers and ran to the window.

"Mr. Latour will come with him, of course," Edith added, without turning her head.

"Adrien!"

Only the name escaped Bennie; but her color grew deeper and her bosom rose and fell faster than her late scamper warranted. It was Miss Fay who showed most power of speech.

"Invite them! Why, Brother Standish, you were the one to insist on the wedding being absolutely private!"

"They invite themselves," Mr. Standish answered.

"Dale is an old, old friend," Bennie said, gravely. "I am glad he is coming."

"But that reckless, obstinate young Creole," her aunt rejoined. "I wish he'd stay away. While we were in Europe he even attempted to tease me! I'm sure I was very glad when his appointment called him home."

"Pshaw, sister! Adrien was a boy five years ago," Standish rejoined. "But when I took the girls to West Point last summer he was the handsomest and most popular of the cadets."

Bennie had not moved from the window, her head resting lightly against the frame, and her eyes, too, seeking the ripples on the distant river.

"Adrien at my wedding! How odd!" were the words she softly spoke, more to herself than to others; but as she lifted her eyes to the distant mountains their haze seemed to reflect a softness into her face, vastly prettier than its usual sauciness.

Miss Tabitha was herself again. Mounted on one of her favorite hobbies, she cantered gayly over the historic fields whereon the Everetts of many a generation had wrought their deeds of derring do. She followed the family down from the summit of Plymouth Rock, through those days when stout arm and stouter heart held foughten field, winding up her eulogy with the highest praise of Dale. When a small break in her column of talk permitted chance for inserting a point of the wedge, Mr. Standish retorted:

At the repetition of the name Bennie again started, a crimson flush dyeing brow and cheek down the slim curve of the graceful throat. Only for a second; then it faded out, leaving her paler than before. But the quick flash of Miss Van der Huysen's eye had caught it, as she slowly faced the group once more, her own face placid and calm. And quickly, also, Bennie's more than normal sauciness returned; and she rattled out, as though she must say something:

"But they are coming, Tab, and they are welcome. Why can't they be groomsmen? Two are not many, dear, but then they are two more than you'll ever have! Edith shall stand with Dale, and Sophie Lord with—Adrien." She paused before speaking, but only for an instant, adding giddily: "They'll both be delighted. We all love the buttons, eh, Tab? Come, confess; didn't you like the buttons, never so long ago?"

And without even a glance at any one else Bennie rushed to her father, threw both arms round his neck and held his face close against her own. Then she ran out of the room with a laugh that died suddenly as she reached the hall stairway.

"I can't quite make Bennie out today," Mr. Standish said, staring toward the door the girl had slammed behind her. "Naturally she ought to be nervous, but"——

"Nonsense, Brother Standish!" cut in Miss Tabitha. "Who wouldn't be nervous six hours before marriage? I should, I'm sure!"

"And very naturally, too," added Edith, as she dropped gracefully into an armchair and picked up the morning's Herald. "I almost believe I should be nervous myself—then!"

"And that reminds me, my dear," replied Mr. Standish, "that—um—m—unless my memory fails me, one of these boys was very devoted to you last summer."

"Both," answered Edith, with a little nod, not looking up from her paper. "They could not have been nicer to me had they been my younger brothers."

"Ah! you sly darling," Miss Fay exclaimed, "I know what brothers' and cousins' devotion means, especially to a girl like you."

The pair were fast allies; but the spinster sat at the feet of her junior's aplomb and world sense with an awe struck meekness foreign to her nature. And she owed Edith an unspoken but deep debt, too; for in all preliminary training necessary to break Bennie's high spirit to the double harness proposition so necessary to family prospects, nothing had availed like Miss Van der Huysen's precept and experience, not to add example. And during the town winter succeeding the encampment, and in all the present spring, all three had been used unceasingly. For, while no such word was spoken at Rose Villa or even whispered in the city, it was tacitly understood that the beautiful American was only waiting a decorous interval before following the example of fortunate belles who had accepted English titles.

Important events had occurred in the Martindale peerage within the twelve months past. Harcourt Annesley Dudley Vernon Mortimer Spencer, its heir apparent, had followed one fox too many. A nasty cropper at a blind ditch in a hotly contested field had landed him on his head and beyond the care for earthly coronets. Then the Hon. Algernon, summoned by cable to nurse his venerable lordship in the illness caused by the terrible shock of his heir's death, arrived only in time to receive his blessing and the title of Algernon, Lord Martindale, the seventeenth of the line.

"I shan't pretend to be broken hearted, you know," he had later written to Edith, in a straggling, boyish, round hand, "for in fact I had hardly ever seen Harcourt since we were little children. And the poor dear old governor was really quite 80, you see, and few men of politics and fashion were fitter to die than he. But I was awfully cut up, dear Miss Van der Huysen, when I knelt for his last blessing and saw his dear old eyes look so wistfully into mine. It made me feel I ought to be worthier of my people; and I am going to be a better man from this, really now; and I want you to let me hope that some day you will let me ask you to help me keep my promise to the dear old governor"——

And to this, and much more of the same sort, Edith had replied in the most delicate style of condolence, and in a most English handwriting, firm as her will and clear as her insight into human nature as it grows in the society hothouse. Only this and nothing more; but it was known at the clubs that Lord Martindale would soon be over, and perhaps it was known only to Edith that when the seventeenth Lady Martindale was presented at court, American aids to the peerage of Britain would feel no shame for their latest addition. Something of this was perhaps behind the

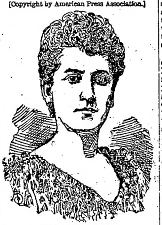
QUEENS OF COLORADO.

CENTENNIAL STATE BEAUTIES DESCRIBED IN GLOWING PHRASE.

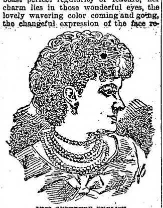
Society Girls Who Add to the Charm of Physical Loveliness the Attraction of Cultured Intelligence—The Belles of Denver, Pueblo and Leadville.

[Copyright by American Press Association.]



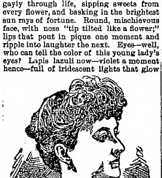
MISS MARY COOPER.

A stately mansion on Capitol hill, a wide, old fashioned, hospitable porch enwreathed and curtained with trailing vines and masses of swaying blossoms. This was the frame. And the picture? A rather long, oval face, with lips just a trifle too full for a Greek model, but oh! what lips for a—well, say for one's betrothed! Eyes such as are not seen once in a twelvemonth even in Baltimore, renowned of old for its beautiful women. True Irish eyes—that peculiar blue gray, fringed with long, jet black lashes, a combination as rare as it is entrancing. Complexion possessing the exceptional charm of ever varying waves of color. No cosmetics here! The "bloom of youth" indeed, but bloom compounded not in chemist's secret closet, but by that most magical of all beautifiers, nature herself. This was my first glimpse of one of Denver's best loved belles, Miss Mary Cooper, second daughter of the governor of Colorado. Miss Cooper cannot boast perfect regularity of feature; her charm lies in those wonderful eyes, the lovely wavering color coming and going, the changeful expression of the face reflecting every emotion of the heart. A pure, sweet natured girl. Amid the haunts of poverty, by the bedside of the sick and suffering that face is well known and loved. A little above the average height of woman, and somewhat careless as to the graceful management of her length of limb and arm. Her taste inclines to soft, clinging gowns of fine wool in the pale tints—dull rose, Quaker gray and the pinkish dove colors. A rustling silk, a heavy velvet is to her an abomination.



MISS GERTRUDE ENGLISH.

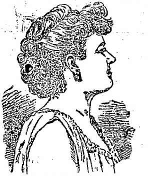
A piquante, petite, delicious darling is Miss Gertrude English, only daughter of a wealthy widow—adored in Denver society all last winter, the pet of the season at Manitou last summer. A fascinating, fluttering, humming bird of a girl, flitting gayly through life, sipping sweets from every flower, and basking in the brightest sun rays of fortune. Round, mischievous face, with nose "tip tilted like a flower;" lips that pout in pique one moment and ripple into laughter the next. Eyes—well, who can tell the color of this young lady's eyes? Lapis lazuli now—violet a moment hence—full of iridescent lights that glow and sparkle, flicker and fade, till one is frantic trying to interpet their bewildering language. This variable little creature has hours of despondency; she withdraws from the crowded ball room, curls herself up on a sofa in some dim anteroom; she assumes a thoughtful pose; she sighs; her eyes lose their light; she mournfully moralizes on the vanity of the world; she avows herself blase; expatiates upon the charms of a convent. You tremble lest she be lost to mankind beneath the gloom of the black veil! You leave her to bring an ice; you wander through the drawing rooms; suddenly there waltzes past, clasped in the arms of the "best dancer of the season," a graceful little figure, a glowing, sparkling face. You catch one mischievous glance, one ironical smile, and the vision is gone—that is Gertrude English.



MISS JULIA KING.

A daughter of whom Denver is already proud, and who is destined to reflect still greater honor upon her native city, is Miss Julia King. Miss King's beauty is of the statuesque order. Tall, with a bearing naturally stately and enhanced by careful training, her face at first seems somewhat at variance with her figure. For after a glance at that well developed, queenly form and carriage one looks for a face expressive of hauteur—something of the impassive coldness of the statue. But instead there looks squarely and fearlessly at you "with level lidded gaze" a pair of the frankest, sincerest, bluest eyes with which a woman was ever dowered. And the face gives the keynote of the character. Candor, simplicity, almost the uncalculating frankness of a child. When Miss Julia graduated the career of the modern belle was open to her; but the young girl gazed serenely down the gilded avenue and coolly turned aside to entreat her mother to allow her to pursue the study of elocution in Boston. To Boston she went, and after a year of hard study emerged from her seclusion, stepped like a goddess from her niche into the whirl of Denver society, and electrified it by her dramatic readings—her rendition of character in amateur theatricals.

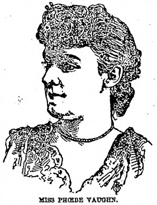
Upon Maxey Tabor fortune has bestowed no more lovely and precious gift than the woman who but a few years since stood by his side, one of the most beautiful brides ever welcomed by Denver. And her brief years of matrimony have in no wise diminished the potency of her beauty. Of medium height, a figure that will bear the test of the artist's strictest measurements, a face reposeful rather than animated, topaz eyes and masses of hair of the color and sheen of the polished oaken leaf when in early autumn it takes on its lustrous, deep toned tints of brown with golden lights. Rather a haughty curve to the ripe red lips, and until one comes to know her well the face seems to wear an inquiring doubting expression—a look that gives men a "weighed-in-the-balance-and-found-wanting" sort of sensation. She is a strikingly handsome woman, see her where you will, but it is not until you behold her in the full splendor of evening dress that you realize her charms. She affects decollete gowns, minus sleeves, and she would be a niggard to the public who so admire her if she didn't. Mrs. Tabor's riviers of diamonds is perhaps the handsomest in Denver, among whose grande dames the costly stones coruscate as numerous as meteors on a summer night.



MRS. MAXEY TABOR.

In conversation she grows animated slowly as her interest rises, but once roused she is a brilliant talker—a charming hostess.

Pueblo boasts its full share of feminine beauty, but in its highest circles there moves no lovelier girl than Miss Phœbe Vaughn. It is almost impossible for the art of even the best photographer to do justice to this young lady, so much of her charm lies in the ever varying expression of her mobile features. Of an ardent, impulsive temperament, her emotions are mirrored in her changeful countenance, which one moment glows with enthusiasm over some favorite theme, and the next is still and reproachful if the topic touched upon does not chance to find her heart responsive. Watch her face as she sits quietly gazing from the window over the familiar mountain scenery. Her thoughts are evidently far away, her soft hazel eyes wear an expression of abstraction, her countenance does not strike you as particularly noticeable; your verdict would be "she is pretty"—nothing more. But wait a few moments; one or two familiar friends approach her. They enter into conversation. She is interested, her eyes darken and brighten, dimples come and go like little wavelets over the surface of a pool, red lips part in smiles, giving a glimpse of perfect teeth. You join the party, she greets you warmly, you forget to criticise, the soft transparent skin woos your lingering gaze, and when she goes to the piano and the pure, sweet voice, trained to a high degree of culture, falls upon your ear, the charm is complete. You forget you thought her only "pretty," and energetically exclaim, "She is beautiful!"



MISS PHŒBE VAUGHN.

Miss Blanche Dougan, of Leadville, is rather above the average height of her sex—a well rounded figure, firm, milk white flesh, violet eyes, whose gaze is steady and unembarrassed; a queenly air which sits well upon her, and which withal is slightly, very slightly, touched with a fine disdain, as of one who has little patience with the "frills and frivols" of modern bellehood. As you come to know her, if you come up to her standard and are allowed a glimpse of the real woman within, you find a mind well stored, a ready facility of expression, a fearless, independent view of things, characteristic of the Colorado girl. The Annihilation of the Auk.

Everybody knows the history of the great auk's extermination. A single shell of one of its eggs without the contents was sold at auction for $1,500. And yet this bird was found on Funk island, off the Newfoundland coast, sixty years ago in numbers that were simply countless. But the people from the mainland used to go over to the island in summer and kill them by myriads to eat and for their feathers. They were very appetizing roasted, and were so fat that they served for fuel also, so that half a dozen great auks did to cook a meal of their brethren for dinner.

The result of this was that forty years back the last of these interesting fowls perished, and there is no longer one of them in existence. The Smithsonian has practically a corner on their bones. A while ago the institution sent a distinguished osteologist, Professor Lucas, to Funk island for the purpose, and he brought back nearly a barrelful of such remains. If you want a skeleton now you will have to send to Washington for it, and it will cost you about $600.—Rene Bache's Letter.

Humor in a Beanery.

In one of those all night restaurants where the succulent fruit of the beanstalk is deftly served by muscular Ganymedes to a public with an equal muscular digestion humor of a grim, remorseless order occasionally asserts itself. It was the hour when the brawny cup bearers were busily engaged in bringing out the relays of heavy crockery to meet the rush of the midnight attack, with broad triangles of "hickory" pie or the round ring shot crullers. Above the roar of battle there suddenly rang out the clarion tones of a muscular servitor as he glanced about for a stray spoon. Seeing none at hand he turned to the steaming sanctuary at the rear, where the esculatory gods were at work, and in thunderous tones broke forth with, "Hey, Jimmie, bring out der silverware!"—New York Times.

A Snake from the Clouds.

A snake story which has the novelty of being true comes from Lackawaxen, Pa. Courtney Kenneally devotes considerable time to the gun and rod, being proficient in the use of both.

A few days ago Kenneally saw a huge hen hawk flying over the house, and taking quick aim sent a charge of duck shot into the bird. It fell almost at his feet, and his astonishment was great at finding in its talons a rattlesnake measuring 3 feet 8 inches. The snake was alive, but Kenneally quickly dispatched it, and kept the wings of the bird and the skin of the "rattler" as "trophies of the chase."—New York Herald.

Carbolic Treatment for Ants.

A new and valuable practical application of carbolic acid has been made in Central America, where it has been used with gratifying success against the leaf cutting ants, whose ravages upon cultivated trees in that country are so destructive. The acid is mixed with water and poured down the ant burrows, whereupon the ants desert their abode, and by persistent resort to this method of attack they may be expelled from the neighborhood of cultivated plants.—Exchange.

The Bacteriological institute, of Vienna, has been conducting experiments on dirt taken from finger nails, and seventy-eight examinations have been made. The process was to put the dirt in "cultivating mixtures," such as are used for supplying germs with food on which to develop. The crop that grew from the germs in the dirt was a varied one, and included thirty-six kinds of micrococci, eighteen of bacilli and many others.

Mr. Herman Oelrichs has long borne a reputation of being a faultlessly dressed man. He is addicted to the wearing of silk underwear, as, indeed, is every man who can afford to buy it, and for the matter of that a good many who can't. It is actually surprising to see how beautifully some young fellows manage to dress on salaries ranging from $1,500 to $3,000 a year. Not only is the outer man beautifully attired, but in seven out of ten the finest of silk and the sheerest of linen will be beneath.

When one remembers that the cheapest of men's silk underwear costs $10 a suit, and that only an ordinarily fine one can be bought for $35 a set, and that any fellow with pretensions to dress, let alone cleanliness, must have at least six, one wonders what system of mathematics the fifteen hundred dollar a year young man pursues to make ends meet. The statisticians who figure that a young man can live comfortably and even elegantly on $5 a week do not include silk underwear in their calcu-

A Preventive For Croup.

The discovery of preventive for croup, is one of the most important made in recent years. Since first discovered it has been used in many cases and with unvarying success. Its being within the reach of all makes it the more valuable. It is only necessary to give Chamberlain's cough remedy freely as soon as the first indications of croup appear, and it will dispel all symptoms of the disease. Full directions are given with each bottle. For 50 cents at Schreieters.

There may be persons in this community who are at times troubled with colic, or subject to attacks of bowel complaint If so, they should try Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy. It will afford almost immediate relief, and when reduced with water is pleasant to take. If taken as soon as the first indication of the disease is felt it will ward off the attack. Many people use it in this way, and find that it never fails them. A 25 or 50 cent bottle may be obtained a W. A. Schreiter's.

When we find a medicine we know to possess genuine merit, we consider it a duty, and take pleasure in telling the public what it is. Such a medicine we found Chamberlain's Cough remedy, last winter, when la grippe was prevailing We are satisfied that we warded off several attacks that were threatening by the use of this syrup and we have since relieved in a few hours, severe colds, and in the course of two or three days, entirely broken them up by its use, as have several of our friends to whom we have recommended it. ARTS OF THE CHINESE.

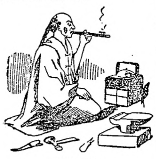
PIG-TAILED HAND WORKERS BEAT LABOR-SAVING MACHINERY.

Making Lanterns And Other Articles—The Celestial Artisans' Dread of Waste—Mongolian Shoe-Makers, Carpenters.

It is not exactly pleasant to speak of Chinese labor in any shape, still less to notice those features in which the most ancient empire in the old world seems to set an example of a certain sort to the most powerful republic in the new. But as Robert Bruce learned a lesson from the spider, it may be worth while in this age of labor controversy to inquire why Chinatown gathers up so large a percentage of the shekels which should properly go into the pockets of American artisans and white men in San Francisco.

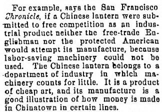
If a citizen of California desires to trace Chinese competition in skilled labor to its source he has only to go into the alleys running east and west from Dupont street beyond California. He will then see that while there is no branch of trade in which the Chinese artisan has not more or less succeeded by mere apt imitation, there are many peculiar handicrafts in which the Swiss and other painstaking, unambitious, persevering, poverty-content European importations are his only rivals.



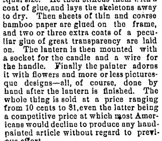
SHOE-MAKER.

For example, says the San Francisco Chronicle, if a Chinese lantern were submitted to free competition as an industrial product neither the free-trade Englishman nor the protected American would attempt its manufacture, because labor-saving machinery could not be used. The Chinese lantern belongs to a department of industry in which machinery counts for little. It is a product of cheap art, and its manufacture is a good illustration of how money is made in Chinatown in certain lines.

Of course, the Chinese lantern is not a necessity of civilized life, neither is it to be regarded as anything but an accidental requirement, as in the case of public displays. But the Chinese have been adepts in picturesque illumination at night from time immemorial, and there is tolerably good evidence that as pyrotechnists they were contemporary with the Pharaohs. Anyhow, it is a hard matter for a white man or a white woman to set about making a Chinese lantern. To begin with the framework of the lantern has to be constructed of fine bamboo splints, split by the hand with a knife, and woven on a frame of the proper size. This work is done by women and children as far as possible, and an expert hand can finish six or eight in a day. When brought to the workshop the workman cuts off the fag ends, shapes it, and rearranges all the splints, so that the interstices will be of equal size. He then stiffens them with a coat of glue, and lays the skeletons away to dry. Then sheets of thin and coarse bamboo paper are glued on the frame, and two or three extra coats of a peculiar glue of great transparency are laid on. The lantern is then mounted with a socket for the candle and a wire for the handle. Finally the painter adorns it with flowers and more or less picturesque designs—all, of course, done by hand after the lantern is finished. The whole thing is sold at a price ranging from 10 cents to $1, even the latter being a competitive price at which most Americans would decline to produce any hand-painted article without regard to previous effort.

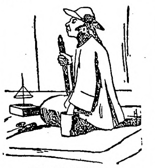


HE MENDEE UMBRELLA.



SIZING UP A JOB.

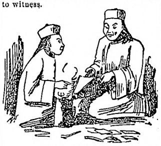
The Chinese workman has the oriental horror of waste. He regards waste as something to be avoided as an evil. Nothing is more convincing on this point than an afternoon stroll through the Chinese industrial centers. If the barber has not the convenience of warm water he shaves or cuts the hair of his friend the smith in fee simple for the use of the latter's furnace. The smith constructs his fire on the principle of burning no coal except in actual work, and then as little as possible. The fire is contained in an iron basin, somewhat like an old-fashioned coal-scuttle, and the mouth of the bellows enters on the back corner. If a drill is to be tempered the water to temper it is kept in an earthen pot, and if any cooking is to be done this pot serves the purpose. When the job is done the coals are picked out, put in a basket, the anvil is set astride of the bellows, and the whole apparatus strung on a pole, so that it can easily be carried off. Even the iron and steel filings are rigorously preserved and utilized.



MENDING OPIUM PIPES.

The same spirit of economy is observable in the case of the tinkers of Chinatown, who show a wonderful dexterity in getting a multiplicity of useful implements into the compass of a few cubic feet. Some of these gentry repair pipes, locks, and other small metallic articles; others give their attention to broken glassware or crockery, while a third makes a specialty of restoring pots and kettles to a sound condition. The repairers of broken glass and crockery perform their work by means of a small drill with which they pierce the fragments, and then fasten them together very neatly with pieces of small wire bent into a hook on the inside of the utensil. Although the glass is drilled while cool (usually with a drill wetted with turpentine) the workman seldom fractures it in mending. Articles of glass which have been broken into several fragments, some of them not half an inch in diameter, are not beyond the perseverance and ingenuity of the Chinatown artificer though it is certain that an American artificer would advise the owner that it might be cheaper to buy a new one.

The Chinese artificer is especially successful as a locksmith, although a regular Chinese lock and key is about as cumbrous and ugly a combination as the human mind can devise. On Ross alley there dwells a Chinese locksmith who not only sells Chinese locks and keys, but understands the construction of the most complicated American locks, and can duplicate a latch key or pick a tumbler lock with a swiftness startling to witness.



A SOLDERING JOB.

The Chinese are good carpenters and joiners, and as watch repairers they can hold their own with the best of white men, but watch making by machinery beats them. They are good harness-makers, and can do any kind of house painting or plastering. Of their aptitude for cigar-making and laundry work there are only too many unwilling witnesses.

As a shoe-maker, and especially as a repairer of shoes, the Chinese artisan is a most formidable competitor with American labor at rates which are, as in most departments where the races come in conflict, 30 to 50 per cent less. It needs a very short stay on any street in Chinatown to disclose the fact that nearly all the repairs executed by Chinese shoe-makers are under orders from the white people resident in the section bounded by California, Kearny, Pacific, and Powell streets. In the department of shoe-making, as in needlework, the Chinese have fairly grappled with and mastered the problem of labor-saving machinery. Three hundred men are daily employed at one establishment on Dupont street alone, and of smaller establishments the name is legion.

Leaving out of consideration Chinese competition in cigar-making, needlework, and especially overalls, it is startling to note in how many branches of industry Chinatown is competing disastrously with American labor. It is sufficient to mention that 1,245 sewing machines are running night and day in Chinatown to indicate what a bee-hive of enforced or willing industry is located there.

Beginning with factories exclusively Chinese, there are in Chinatown the following establishments working on the wholesale plan as producers in the articles mentioned: Tinware, six; shoes, two; candles, one; tanned leather, five; brooms, two; jewelry, four. Of clothing establishments and tailor shops (exclusive of underwear and shirts), there are no fewer than fifty-seven places of business under different proprietors.

Self-Inflicted Punishment.

An amusing incident, illustrating the character traits of Russian peasants is reported by the Viestnik of Wilna. A party of peasants who had been cutting wood in a forest near Disna, and had spent all their earnings on drink, were wending their way homeward. "Well, brethren," said one of the party, "we are a lot of bad fellows. While every honest man works to lay by something for the cold winter, we have wasted all our earnings of the summer in brandy." "We are a lot of bad fellows, indeed!" rejoined the whole party in assent. "Let us punish ourselves for our waywardness," suggested an elderly peasant; "let us each inflict upon the other twenty-five blows with green reeds." The whole party assented again. They repaired to a bush, cut fresh reeds, and began executing the self-imposed punishment. They each stripped themselves naked in turn and received the stripes stoically. The last one of the party, however, demurred, and attempted to run away before his turn came. He was caught, and in punishment for his attempt to escape he received fifty lashes, double the number of the designated chastisement. Hardly alive, the poor fellow was brought to Disna, where he was laid up in the hospital for some time.

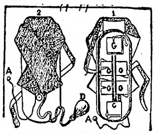
AN INVISIBLE WALKING CAMERA.

Neckties Furnished with a Complete Photographing Outfit.

We have all heard of the photographic opera-glasses and hat; but here we have something more cunning. It is a necktie provided with a pin. The latter is an objective, and the necktie is a camera. When any one approaches you and speaks to you at a distance of two or even three feet, you press a rubber bulb concealed in your pocket, and you have the portrait of your interlocutor. This ingenious little apparatus, with which also general views may be taken, was devised by Edmond Block, a Frenchman.



THE PHOTOGRAPHIC NECKTIE.

Fig. 1 represents the photographic necktie, and Fig. 2 gives a front view of it as it is to be worn by the operator, the metallic camera, which is flat and very light, being hidden under the vest. Fig. 1 gives a back view, the cover of the camera being removed to show the interior mechanism, comprising six small frames, which are capable of passing in succession before the objective, and which permit of obtaining six negatives. The instrument may be constructed with twelve or eighteen frames.

The apparatus is operated as follows; The necktie having been adjusted the shutter is set by a pull upon the button A (Fig. 1, No. 2), which passes under the vest. In order to change the plate, it is necessary to turn from left to right the button-hole of the vest, and which simulates a button of that garment.

This button must be turned until the effect of a locking, which occurs at C (Fig. 1 No. 1) is perceived, and which puts the plate exactly before the objective. In order to open the latter it is necessary to press the rubber bulb, D, which has been put into the trousers pocket. The rubber tube E, passes under the vest and serves to transmit the action of the hand.

In order to charge the apparatus it is opened at the bottom by turning the small springs; the sensitized plates are put into the frames and the springs are turned back to their former position.

The apparatus is scarcely any thicker than the ordinary necktie. The six frames are carried before the objective through an endless chain, as shown in the figure.

Some of the potographs taken with this first apparatus are sufficiently sharp to allow the portraits to be recognized. The photos are an inch and a half square.

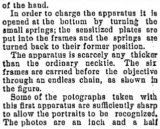
TRICYCLE COACHES.

An Idea of What These Conveyances Look Like.

The coming introduction of tricycle coaches upon the streets of our city has met with the hearty approval of a long-suffering public, whose hopes are now raised that the new conveyances will be some relief from the present slow-going street cars. The organization of the new company will in all likelihood be completed within a day or two. A manager for the new company has been already selected and everything is progressing in a quiet, rapid, and successful manner toward the incorporation of the Tricycle Coach company. The promoters of the new enterprise have been running a sample of the new coaches for several weeks with a view to testing its adaptation to their requirements. Of this coach the Free Press today presents a cut. The coaches which are to be used here, however, will be twice the size of this one, carrying sixteen passengers while this one carries but eight. The coach will be placed on the streets of Detroit for the purpose of exhibiting it to the public.—Detroit Free Press.

THE TRICYCLE COACH.

New Military Tent.



The umbrella tent is one of new design for military purposes. The method of construction of this tent admits of opening either one section or as many sections as may be desired. It can also be entirely closed by hooking up the tent flaps and closing the entrance, in case of a storm, or when being used for bathing purposes. In warm weather the walls of the tent should be staked two or three inches from the ground, which, in connection with the large opening between the umbrella and side walls will cause a constant draught of air. The especial feature of the tent is its simple construction and portability. It folds up, and the bundle, including poles, stakes, guy lines, &c., when the tent is made of ten-ounce duck, weighs about forty-six pounds. The tent was first used by the New Jersey troops at the last encampment at Sea Girt.

Two boys, while hunting recently in Ojai Valley, California, were treed by a big bear, which kept them on their uncomfortable perch for eighteen hours, devouring all the provisions in the meantime. An old hunter came along and raised the siege with a bullet.

DOING WITHOUT MEN.

Members of the Sterner Sex Not as Indispensable to Women as They Used to Be.

Are men indispensable to the fair sex? Can they be spared? Is it possible to do without these towers of strength? asks Nell Nelson in the N. Y. World. Until within a few years they were regarded as absolutely indispensable and are still by a certain class of timid, untutored, lovable women, but it would seem from the actions and utterances of the bright, smart sisterhood who constitute the rank and file of the progressive and advanced movements that the muscular creatures have been pushed aside with scorn and disdain.

Women are living their own lives. They are walking alone. They have aims and ambitions. They have wires laid, and they are excavating by their own little selves wholly and entirely independent of the hitherto indispensable race of men.

Every bank up-town has a ladies' department, with special service for the convenience of the fair creatures who keep accounts. Here the gentle financiers transact their business as quietly and unconcernedly as though the whole world were feminine. In the cafes, restaurants, and hotels, dining-rooms, sections, or tables are reserved for the fair patrons who are so easy and untrammeled in their movements that it would be jocose to raise the question of masculine indispensability.

Not only does the lone lady boss the waiter, but she calls for her favorite newspaper and reads cable reports and editorials with her arms akimbo, the sheet opened at full width, her heels on the footrest, and often a toothpick between her teeth.

Go to the church, the lecture, the theater, the concert, or the opera in season, and you will find by the predominance of the fair sex how very easily it dispenses with masculine attendance. These brave ladies generally go in couples, often in groups, and frequently in single harness. It is nonsense to talk about the conventionalities. If a progressive woman wants to hear a preacher, a singer, a speaker, or an orchestra, and she has $1 she will snap her fingers in the face of "form" and go! The advanced woman will go, too, but in a little different manner. She may have a maid, borrowed for the occasion, at her side; if the occasion is a grand one and seats are at a premium the attendant will wait for her in the dressing-room or in the little four-wheeler on the street.

One of the most approved plans among the advanced girls of New York is the messenger service. She starts out early in the evening, perhaps alone, or attended by the kitchen maid, who takes her to the car. The art reception, the conversational, the lecture, or the concert over, Miss Fearless has a call rung for a messenger and with his escort and an expense of 25 cents or 50 cents gets home safely and speedily. Some of the best paid choir soloists in New York adopt this plan, thereby saving a huge livery bill of expense and gaining a lot of personal freedom.

"I make it a rule," she says, "never to depend on the tenor or bass to see me home. There is a call-box in the church basement and I get a boy escort for a dime. At receptions and companies where I go as a guest or a soloist, I resort to the same medium. My car is quick and the moment the bell rings I am ready to go. I never accept the escort of a gentleman. It is such bad form, don't you know."

The proof of masculine indispensability is more emphatic in ultra-fashionable circles. Take the Casino balls at Newport or the Sherry dances in town, and if an unmarried lady is not accompanied by her brother, or a relative, or a chaperon, she has her maid, who assists her from a carriage or a car and waits for her through the dance. Women travel over the country alone, they cross the ocean in every steamer by their own sweet selves, they check their own baggage, get through the customs offices with as much speed and as little friction as their brothers. They are their own agents and managers in business transactions and a law unto themselves in politics, philosophy, science, and religion. And still it is a question if the indispensability of man does not have a tendency to keep woman just a little sweeter, a little more gentle and pliable, and a trifle more charming.

The girl with the dimples and the matron with the dancing curls, who dare not venture into a crowd or out in the dark without a man, may be called dolls, but there is something ineffably sweet about the timidity and the faith that pins itself to the honor of indispensable man.

Women are very lovable and men are indispensable, because they keep them lovable by telling them so.

Palaces of Various Kinds.

Away back in the misty past, when the porcelain-makers of China combined and erected their famous "palace of porcelain," they little thought of the example they were setting for coming generations. The ice-bound Russians first took the hint and erected the first of the "ice palaces"—an example followed by Montreal, Quebec, St. Paul, and other boreal American cities, who thought to boom their prospects by advertising the fact to the world at large that they were situated within the circle of the shadow cast by the north pole. With a more practical eye to business, the people of the south erected the "cotton palace" at New Orleans, followed closely by the "corn palace" at Sioux City, Iowa. Since the last-named unique erection "palaces" have sprung up all around, like toad-stools in damp weather. Nebraska has her "sugar palace," Creston, Iowa, her "hay palace," Pueblo, Col., her "mineral palace," Ottumwa, Iowa, a "coal palace," and last but not least the "flax palace" at Forest City, Iowa. If this "palace" business is carried much farther we may soon expect to hear of a "gold palace" on Wall street, an "oyster palace" on the shores of the classic Chesapeake, or a "yam palace" in Georgia.—St. Louis Republic.

Choking Off the Drummer.

There were half a dozen of us waiting in Buffalo for a midnight train to go, and by and by one of the crowd started off with:

"It was just such a night as this, and just at this hour, when I went through the bridge at Fort Dayton, and was the only one in the car to escape alive. All the others were drowned."

"The car went into the water, eh?" asked a man wearing a soiled linen duster.

"Yes sir.

"Car went into the water! It was at Fort Dayton, Iowa? What river, please?"

"The Mo—Moline," choked the drummer, and it was plain to see that he had only made a stab at it.

"Moline river, eh! When was this?

"In 1883."

"What month?"

August."

"What date?"

"The 17th."

"Thank you. Let us see. Here is my note book. Let me turn to the date. Ah! I have it. August 17, 1883. Well sir. I find that on that date the Moline river was just 130 miles distant from Fort Dayton and that Fort Dayton had neither a bridge nor a railroad. You must have made a mistake, sir. Wasn't it a cider mill or a cheese factory on the Wabash river in Indiana you escaped from?"

The liar pulled off his coat and offered to fight any man in the crowd, but it was no use. The man in the duster had already knocked the stuffing out of him.

Always in Season: Salt.

Oh! ye who teach the ingenious youth of our great and growing nation, let them learn the noble art of self-defense, as Salvation Oil is the specific for hurts.

Two charming little girls were dancing "the racket" in the streets. "What makes you so happy?" a gentleman asked. "Oh! our mas have thrown away all our horrid medicine, and we have only to take Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup, and that ain't bad at all."

Dishonored Drafts,

When the stomach dishonors the drafts made upon it by the rest of the system, it is necessarily because its fund of strength is very low. Toned with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, it soon begins to pay out vigor in the shape of pure, rich blood containing the elements of muscle, bone and brain. As a sequence of the new vigor afforded the stomach, the bowels perform their functions regular and the liver works like clockwork. Malaria has no effect upon a system thus reinforced.

"It makes me tired!

People ask me—is marriage a failure? Of course 't'aint; s'pose I don't know my biz—what am I here for?" If the women only keep healthy they keep in good spirits and cupid is in demand. Let every enfeebled woman know this—there's a remedy that'll cure her, the proof's positive.

Here's the proof—if it doesn't do you good within reasonable time, report the fact to its makers and get your money back without a word—but you won't do it!

The remedy is Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription—and it has proved itself the right remedy in nearly every case of female weakness. It is not a miracle. It won't cure everything—but it has done more to build up enfeebled and broken-down women than any other medicine known.

Gloom in New York.

"Do you know what most forcibly impresses a foreigner visiting New York for the first time?" asked a titled member of the British iron workers.

"The dirt?"

"No," said the ironmaster. "The dirt is bad enough in all truth; but something more important than this strikes any foreigner of average power of reflection. It is the extraordinary cloud of gloom and preoccupation which hangs over the citizens of New York. It has an almost saddening effect upon a stranger. I do not wish you to think that I am speaking recklessly or flippantly. I am not. The thing has impressed me forcibly ever since I have been here, and I do not recall any other city in the world where it is so noticeable.

"In Chicago business men look worried and excited; in Boston there is a large enough leisure element and sufficient jollity to amuse any crowd, and so it is in all of the other cities of the country. But New York men have the gloom of Egyptian mummies. You may enter and leave a thousand elevated cars without seeing a smiling face, and men talk with one another with the serious and preoccupied look of criminals discussing their fate in the cells of a jail. Visitors to New York always speak of it as a very jolly place, but the citizens of the town apparently miss all the fun."—New York World.

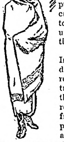
THE SIOUX INDIANS.

SITTING BULL AND HIS BAND OF FIERCE WARRIORS.

The Messiah Craze--The Indian Religious Nature--Dangers of a War--Army Officers' Services--Cost of Indian Wars.

[Special Chicago Correspondence.]



OCCASIONAL outbreaks among the Indians will undoubtedly occur so long as the Government pursues the policy of crowding the Indians together in large bodies upon narrow reservations.

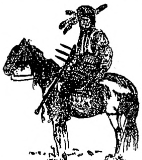
The restiveness of the Indian is nearly always due either to the occurrence or a fear of unjust treatment on the part of the whites, or to the restlessness that comes from the lack of occupation and scope for his activities due to the long and uneventful life upon the Government reservations.

Among modern Indians, Sitting Bull undoubtedly occupies the chief place on account of the influence he has exercised over large bodies of his savage fellows.

Sitting Bull has always claimed for himself the honor of having met the attack Major Reno's force made on the Sioux village in the Custer fight, but as a matter of fact the Bull "was not in it," and when cross-examined about his connection with that struggle had to admit that he was away from the camp making "big medicine" with which to protect his fellow Indians while Crazy Horse was decimating Reno's command with a repeating war club.

Nevertheless, while Sitting Bull is not the great warrior that has been claimed, he is undoubtedly the politician and statesman of the great Sioux nation, and the man more than any other Indian who has fomented the present border agitation.

The vast majority of mankind believes that at some future date the Messiah will appear on earth for the second time. It is a great and in many instances a fundamental truth—the groundwork of doctrine on which more than one church is founded. The Indians of the northwest have been informed by their "medicine men" that their Messiah is coming. He is to redeem them from their low estate, and when he gets through with the work of the Anglo-Saxon annihilation he will exalt the red man until there is nothing left for the untutored mind to conceive nor the aboriginal greediness to grasp; the copper colored millenium has been announced. The effect of this revelation upon the Indian intellect is beyond the comprehension of most white people, and yet any ordinarily intelligent person might easily understand how much excitement there would be in the country if the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage were to proclaim to all that he had seen the Messiah in person at some place, and that the long awaited one would be here in a month or two. Such an announcement would make as much excitement among the whites as has resulted among the Indians for a similar cause, and perhaps the excitement would take the form of religious dancing. Thousands of Shakers gyrate clumsily just as often as they think necessary and no one ever thinks of charging their ungraceful antics to anything but honest religious fervor. Members of various and numerous evangelical churches indulge in what to the unconverted sometimes seems to be frenzied enthusiasm, but which civilization recognizes as not only legitimate, but eminently natural.



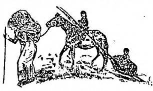
A SIOUX WARRIOR.

The Indian is naturally religious. With all his savagery, he is serious and earnest in all he does, and prone to relate human events to the operations of a higher power. It may be, as General Miles surmises, that the Mormons have stirred up the present Messiah craze; but it remains the fact that the Sioux have been restive ever since the deal by [illegible] they transferred a large [illegible] [illegible] their lands to the United States Government, and bad influences have been at work among them inciting them to discontent and schemes of revenge. They have been coddled and fed and petted by the Government, and likewise robbed (as many of them believe) of much of their lands, and they have an entirely false idea of their own strength and that of the whites.

Nevertheless, a campaign in the "bad lands," against the Sioux, would be no child's play for our army. It would be the greatest Indian war of modern times, and the regular army officers surrounding General Miles's headquarters here do not relish the thought of such a conflict. They know that it will be fierce and bloody, if it begins, and the best thing they hope for is to make it short and decisive at a lamentable sacrifice of men.

The Sioux warrior, fully armed and mounted, and able to select his own fighting ground, is the most dangerous opponent to be found in the world. He is an unexcelled fighter, fearless, cunning, and tireless, and marvelously skillful in sudden attack and timely retreat. He is bothered by no incumbrances. He carries his equippage with him, and he leaves squaw and pappooses, with an old horse, perhaps, to look after his camp and follow him the best they can in his erratic campaigns. And, let it be said, the Indian women are no mean factors in the savage method of fighting. They are thoroughly self reliant, and can pack up and set out on the march after their fleeing braves at a moment's notice. They keep thoroughly informed of events, and are able in many ways to assist retreat or baffle pursuit.

Did anybody ever try to figure out the cost of an Indian outbreak? Perhaps the attempt has been made, but the War Department knows nothing about it. The greater proportion of damages can not be assessed, for more injury is done to the material welfare of the region in which the trouble exists than can be ascertained or expressed in dollars. Some of the figures—indefinite at best—can, however, be given, and they are decidedly interesting. Since 1856 it has cost the United States just $190,321,902.16 to feed and clothe the American Indian, and during the same period this great and rich Government paid out the enormous sum of $630,209,136.91 to keep him on the reservations and, when he broke away, to subdue his savage spirit. There were times when the expenditure of $5,000 in provisions would have prevented a tribe from going on the warpath, but the Government generally preferred to let the Indians go scalp hunting and then spent $50,000 in dragging home and making him behave himself.



ON THE MARCH.

The Sioux affected by the present condition of affairs number, all told, about 20,000 souls, and are theoretically located at Pine Ridge, Rosebud, Standing Rock, Cheyenne River, Crow Creek, and Lower Brule agencies. To these people have been and will be issued an immense quantity of provisions during the current fiscal year. Of beef the regular contract calls for 14,200,000 pounds. There were 23,000,000 pounds of flour ordered, 209,000 pounds of coffee, 399,000 pounds of sugar, 457,000 pounds of bacon, 283,000 pounds of corn, 121,500 pounds of beans, 69,000 pounds of hard tack, 36,000 pounds of hominy, 7,500 pounds of lard, 22,000 pounds of rice, 147,000 pounds of salt and nearly 2,000 pounds of tea. Besides these there was expended in open market the sum of $101,000, principally for beef, and recently the Indian Bureau authorized the expenditure of an additional sum of $15,000 for beef at Pine Ridge. And yet there is trouble in the northwest.

WILL STANLEY.

Boys at Three Cents Each.

Henry M. Stanley has 18 dark skinned lads, whom he bought on the banks of the Congo at the moderate price of three cents a head. When he founded the station at Stanley Falls, he found in the hands of the Arabs 2,300 captives whom they had dragged into slavery. The poor wretches were suffering for food, and some of them were in a starving condition. He says:

Among them were many little boys. I selected 18 of the poor little fellows, and bought them of the Arabs for a handkerchief apiece. The handkerchiefs cost three cents each in Manchester, and so I obtained the little negroes very cheaply. I took them because I wished to save them, and as they were almost certain to die of starvation, the Arabs were willing to sell them at almost any price.

The little fellows, who were from 10 to 12 years of age, were with me in my steamer when I went down the river again. I distributed them, two or three together, among the stations, directing the agents to instruct them, show them how to work, and to endeavor as they grew up to make civilized young fellows of them. They all came from the Biyerre River, and as I did not know their language I could not communicate with them. Soon after I left for Europe.

Last summer, when Sir Francis de Winton returned from the Congo, he brought one of these boys with him. The lad is a bright fellow, about 16 years old, and has been with me since he came to England. As he had learned the Swahili language I could readily converse with him, and he also speaks a good deal of English now.

By and by this boy will return to the Congo, and will probably be sent back among his own people; and so with the other seventeen little fellows, they will be trained up as the friends and missionaries of the new order of things on the Congo.

Easily Answered.

Little Marjorie has an inquiring mind. She is pursuing her education according [illegible] the Socratic method—of question and [illegible]swer—and keeps the older members of the family pretty well employed.

"Oh, papa!" she cried, running after that busy man, as he was just starting for his office, "wait just a minute, please; I have two very important questions I want to ask you."

"I can't stop now, Marjorie," said her father; "I'm in a great hurry this morning."

"It won't take you but just a minute to answer them, papa," pleaded Marjorie, "for you always know about everything."

"Well, what are they?" asked papa, not quite proof against this flattery, though his hand was on the door knob.

"I knew you'd wait," said Marjorie, in triumph; "and all I want you to tell me is, how they make condensed milk, and who were Abraham's forefathers, please?"

"Ask your mamma, Marjorie," said her father, as he fled from the house.

ROMANCE OF PATENTS.

HOW THE INVENTORS ARE REWARDED FOR GENIUS.

Honors and Emoluments for the Originators of Valuable Ideas—Some of the Singular Articles from Which Fortunes Have Been Made.

"There is," says an eminent authority, "scarcely an article of human convenience or necessity in the market to-day that has not been the subject of a patent in whole or in part. The sale of every such article yields its inventor a profit. If we purchase a box of paper collars a portion of the price goes to the inventor; if we buy a sewing machine the probability is that we pay a royalty to as many as a dozen or fifteen inventors at once." Lord Brougham often said that he would gladly have exchanged his honors and emoluments for the profits and renown of the inventor of the peramblator or sewing machine. We are not wishful to lead our readers to covet what are termed "large fortunes" as really conducive to happiness or usefulness. "Fortune" is itself a heathen and not a christian word. But "invention" is another thing, and the remunerative results are a fitting element for consideration in these days. Howe, the originator of the sewing machine, derived £100,000 a year from it, and from their mechanic improvements the celebrated Wheeler & Wilson are reputed to have divided for many years an income of £200,000, while the author of the Singer sewing machine left at his decease nearly £3,000,000. The telephone, the planing machine and the rubber patents realized many millions, while the simple idea of heating the blast in iron smelting increased the wealth of the country by hundreds of millions. The patent for making the lower ends of candles taper instead of parallel, so as to more easily fit the socket, made the present enormous business of a well-known firm of London chandlers. The "drive well" was an idea of Colonel Green, whose troops during the war were in want of water. He conceived the notion of driving a two-inch tube into the ground until water was reached, and then attaching a pump. This simple contrivance was patented, and the tens of thousands of farmers who have adopted it have been obliged to pay him a royalty, estimated at £600,000. A large profit was realized by the inventor who patented the idea of making umbrellas out of alpaca instead of gingham, and the patentee of the improved "paragon frame" (Samuel Fox) lately left by will £170,000 out of the profits of his invention. The weaving, dyeing, lace and ribbon making trades originated and depend for their existence upon ingenious machinery, the result of an infinity of inventive efforts.

The discovery of the perforated substance used for bottoming chairs and for other purposes has made its inventor a millionaire. George Yeaton, the inventor in question, was a poor Yankee cane-seater in Vermont. He first distinguished himself by inventing a machine for weaving cane, but he made no money out of it, as some one stole his idea and had the process patented. After a number of years' experimenting Yeaton at last hit upon this invention, which consists of a number of thin layers of boards of different degrees of hardness glued together to give pliability. He formed a company, and to-day he has a plant valued at $500,000, and is in the receipt of a princely annual revenue derived rom this invention. Carpet beating, from being an untold nuisance, has become a lucrative trade through inventive genius and mechanical contrivance. Even natural curiosity has been turned to account in the number of automatic boxes for the sale of goods of all kinds, and fabulous dividends have been paid by the companies owning the patents. The most profitable inventions have been the improvements in simple devices, things of every-day use, that everybody wants. Among the number of patents for small things may be mentioned the "stylographic pen," and a pen for shading in different colors, producing $40,000 per annum. A large profit has been reaped by a miner who invented a metal rivet or eyelet at each end of the mouth of coat and trousers pocket to resist the strain caused by the carriage of pieces of ore and heavy tools. In a recent legal action it transpired in evidence that the inventor of metal plates used to [illegible]tect soles and heels of boots from [illegible] sold upward of 12,000,000 plates [illegible], and in 1887 the number reach[illegible] 143,000,000, producing realized profits of a quarter of a million of money. Another useful invention is the "darning weaver," a device for repairing stockings, undergarments, etc., the sale of which is very large and increasing. As large a sum as was ever obtained for any invention was enjoyed by the inventor of the inverted glass bell to hang over gas to protect ceilings from being blackened, and a scarcely less lucrative patent was that for simply putting emery powder on cloth. Frequently time and circumstances are wanted before an invention is appreciated, but it will be seen that patience is well rewarded, for the inventor of the roller skate made over £200,000, notwithstanding the fact that his patent had nearly expired before its value was ascertained. The gimlet-pointed screw has produced more wealth than most silver mines, and the American who first thought of putting copper tips to children's shoes is as well off as if his father had left him £400,000 in United States bonds. Upward of £2,000 a year was made by the inventor or the common needle threader. To the foregoing might be added thousands of trifling but useful articles from which handsome incomes are derived or for which large sums have been paid.

LOVE-MAKING BY RAIL.

One Dear Little Darling Was Afraid the Lamp Wouldn't Go Out.

The car was filled with excursionists returning from the exposition. Every seat contained a pair of Buckeye lovers. The last bear died in Ohio some time ago, but the art of hugging has survived. It was the midnight express, and the air was right chilly, but not a soul noticed that except a poor little married man who sat alone in the half seat by the unlighted stove. He looked down the car and noticed that apparently all the young men were one armed; at least, but one arm of each male was visible. The light in the car was very low, however, and that may account for the phenomenon.

Lovers like twilight, according to the Pittsburg Dispatch. If Adam and Eve did not sing "In the Gloaming" it was because they knew a fresher song. And it was twilight in that car, for all three double lamps were turned down very low, and, before the train was out of the Alleghany yards, the flame of one of them had sputtered, fired a moment and expired. Of course, every girl in the car was alarmed when the gloom deepened. Every girl got a little closer to her protector, and a few minutes later, when the second began to show signs of collapse—the flame leaping up frantically, as if afraid to die—about a dozen pianissimo screams came from as many feminine throats.

The conductor opened the door a few minutes later and the draught finished lamp No. 2. This left one lamp alight at the rear end of the car. How anxiously it was observed! Would it go out? It looked consumptive, but there was no draught to expedite its decease. At last the train whistled for the first stop, and the little married man came out of his corner by the stove to alight. He had been a bachelor once, and he remembered it as he laid his hand on the door knob. The train had not stopped, but he opened the door, and immediately a gust of wind murdered the last lamp. As he stood in the doorway inhaling cinders and river fog, he had the satisfaction of hearing a sweet, low voice murmur behind him: "Oh, George, I was so afraid?"

"Of what, my darling?"

"That that lamp would never go out!"

Where Sleep the Brave?

Where sleep the brave to-night?
Ask the pines in a sunny land,
Ask the grasses that wave
O'er the dust of a gallant band
Laid in a hurried grave.
There sleep the brave to-night.

Where sleep the brave to-night?
Ask the waves of the mighty sea,
That once the heroes bore;
They sing a parting threnody
Against the rocky shore.
There sleep the brave to-night.

Where sleep the brave to-night?
Ask the winds from the starry sky
Where holy angels dwell;
They have roamed where the ashes lie,
And they alone can tell
Where sleep the brave to-night.

An Island Paradise.

The island of Hogolen, in the Polynesia, is an immense coral atoll, 130 miles in circumference, having four entrance passages. On the reef and within it are seventy islands, four of which, near the middle, are high basaltic masses about thirty miles each in circumference, magnificently fertile, yielding spontaneously many valuable products, situated in the midst of a rock-bound lake ninety miles long by half that width. This unknown ocean paradise has been for ages an arena of combat between two hostile races, one copper-colored, inhabiting the two western of the great interior isles, the other upon the two eastern, a darker people, with long, straight hair. The two tribes are supposed to number over 20,000.

Bull Run Battlefield.

I have just returned from a trip over the Bull Run battlefield, said Gen. McCook, recently, where my youngest brother was killed in July 1861. I was assured while there th[illegible] there have been but few changes [illegible] the face of the country. The lines held by Jackson in the second battle, especially in the railroad cut, are easily discovered. Huge trees in the vicinity of the cut were lopped off by shell and cannon balls during the fight, and the stumps still stand as mute witnesses of the fierce conflict that waged there twenty-eight years ago. The old and historic stone house and the Warrenton turnpike near Young's branch still stand, and the stone bridge over Bull Run has been repaired.

"Looking Backwards."

The Chinese government is tracing the Chinese race back into the misty past, and it has discovered that China was a great empire 3,000 years, B. C. They are now working on a clue to lead up to the discovery of America by a Chinaman, who sailed away and was never heard of again.

Iowa Territory's First White Child.

A few days ago at Humboldt, Ia., Mrs. Malvina Bankhead, who enjoys the distinction of having been the first white child born in Iowa territory, 91 years of age, rode from her farm to Humboldt, fifteen miles, on horseback, with only an hour's rest on the road. The excursion was in celebration of her 91st birthday. She is a well preserved old lady, handsome and possessed of a becoming taste for dress and modern styles. She was accompanied by her daughter, aged 70, and her son 68, who rode beside her in a buggy, being too infirm from age to endure horseback riding. The old lady has ten other children living in the county. She is the grandmother of 72, of whom 53 are grandparents themselves, making her the great-great-grandmother of seven—Des Moines Letter.

A Hot Needle for Warts.

I have always had warts on my hands ever since I was a boy, and have tried a thousand remedies for them, including all the charms known to the oldest darky in the country. The only thing that would suppress them even temporarily was a red hot needle. Somebody told me about it ten or fifteen years ago, but I never tried it for a long time, dreading the pain. At last I had a big wart on the knuckle of my left forefinger, where I was always knocking it against something and keeping it raw and sore.

I determined to try the hot needle. So I had a large needle fixed in an awl handle, heated it red hot in the flame of a lamp, and thrust it through the big wart at one punch. The pain was no greater than I had been enduring from striking the wart against everything I touched, and after the needle had cooled I took it out. The wart began to dry up, and in three or four days I picked it off with my thumb nail. Since then whenever one makes its appearance I take a needle to it, and the remedy never fails.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

School "Sundries."

In 1889 the Cincinnati school board furnished 1,200 wash basins at a cost of forty cents a dozen, making $40. Tin cups to the number of 1,800 were bought and distributed to the different schools, making thirty to each house, and about six to eight cups to each room. Eight barrels, or 320 gallons, of ink were used, and it was put into 38,257 ink wells. Boxes of crayon chalk to the extent of 800 were used, and they cost in all $33.75.

Each box contains one gross of crayons, making 115,200 in all, and they were used at the rate of 571 a day, or ten in each school house on an average. It must be remembered that not half the rooms use chalk. Of pens 288,000 were distributed, or seven to each pupil. They cost the city thirty-five and one-half cents per gross, or in all $710. One hundred and forty-four thousand penholders were distributed at a cost of about $500.—Cincinnati Times-Star.

Art of Gem Cutting.

The art of cutting gems lingered on in Constantinople after the fall of the empire, but few stones were cut in western Europe. Charlemagne used as his seal an antique gem with the head of Jupiter Serapis; Pepin le Bref one with a Bacchus on it. In 1555, however, Giovanni Bernardi cut stones so beautifully for Lorenzo de Medici that he was called Giovanni delle Carniole, and a contemporary of his was named Domenico dei Kamei. The Picklers, Tyrolese artists, settled in Rome in the Eighteenth century, cut gems so perfectly that they had to sign them to prevent their passing as veritable antiques.—London Letter.

The Zither at Alexander's Feast.

We know that at the wedding festivities of Alexander the Great with Statira, the daughter of Darius, some of the most famous kitharists, as Kathrinos of Methymna, Athenodores of Tejos, and others, had to play. It is also known that some of the best zither players of those days, like Anobeos, received a magnificent remuneration for public appearances—an Attic talent (about $500) being nothing unusually high for the performance. Under the Roman emperors, too, the kithara, often changed and improved, flourished as a fashionable instrument, and even as late as 1150 after Christ the Greek Emperor Manuel esteemed the famout kitharist, Samotheres Logotheta very highly because of his art.

During the following centuries several varieties of zitherlike instruments were in use, such as the cithara barbara, the cithara tontonica, and the psalterium in Germany and adjoining countries, the crowt in England and Scotland, and the verginale or clarichordiun later on—about 1500. The latter, together with the psalter, were popular in nearly all European countries, and it was really not until the time that the forerunners of the present piano, the spinet, etc., came into general use—about the end of the last century—that the zither went out of date.—American Art Journal.

Jay Gould's Office.

Probably to most persons the most interesting object in Mr. Jay Gould's office in the Western Union building is Mr. Gould himself. The room itself is rather handsomely furnished in a substantial way, but there are scores of down town offices which surpass it in gorgeousness. It has windows opening on Broadway and Dey street, and there is no trouble about the light. Mr. Gould sits at a big desk facing the entrance. Occasionally a visitor sees something to indicate that he is in a place where real millions figure in the calculations of the establishment. The other day there was a chair in the office which nobody sat in. It was occupied by a big pile of papers whose respectable green has conveyed suggestions of bonds and stocks and other securities. But Mr. Gould hardly glanced at the delightful pile of paper. He acted as if he were used to seeing such things every day, even where the folks didn't have company.—New York Times.

Old Time Boodle.

The "general court" did not go without its little perquisites in colony days. According to Dr. Shurtleff's "Topography of Boston" Governor's island was "granted and confirmed to the said John Winthrop and his heirs in fee farms, for which they are to pay only two bushels of apples every year—one bushel to the governor and another to the general court in winter—the same to bee of the best apples there growing." "It is supposed," says Dr. Shurtleff, "that the apples were faithfully paid in every year, and that each of the members of the general court carried home his pockets full, for again in 1642 the following significant entry appears upon the records: 'The busheli of apples was paid in.'"—Boston Transcript.

He Saved Something.

We meet many peculiar characters in this world. I ran across a man once—and he was a man of intelligence and a man of splendid family, wealthy and all that—who lost his wife, and who, in telling me of his bereavement, said:

"Well, I will save something out of the wreck. I can wear her stockings. See here," and he rolled up his pantaloons. Sure enough, there were woman's stockings of fine texture and reaching away above the knee. He proceeded to explain that he had bought her several pairs at $2 each just a week before she died, but she had never had any use of them, and he would have to wear them out, though he was sorry he had bought them.

The idea was so funny that it was all I could do to keep from laughing right out, as the saying is, but the man was so very serious that I repressed the inclination to do so. I told him it was sad, but as long as he could save something out of the wreck by wearing his dead wife's hosiery he was not in such a bad fix, but still he could not see the ludicrous side of his narrative.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

That thereafter, to-wit: On the 16th day of August, 1887, said mortgagee, for value received, sold and duly assigned said mortgage to Albert W. Miss Henedine Meunier de Lagassy, the charming Poplar River young lady, was in the city this week during the fair, a guest of Miss Evelyn Paul.

Wm. Ralph, who has been absent for three months, returned Tuesday. Every body was pleased to see William. He says, too. 'tis pleasant to be among his rends again.

Genius does not always seek the crowded marts of the universe. It is often to be found in the remotest corners of the globe. Poplar River is the home of an invertor. Another township, not far distant, is the abiding place of an old man who is trying to discover the phenomena perpetual motion, and who claims to be on the brink of success. Alas! How many others have made the same claim to an incredulous world, whose doubts have but proved too true. Photographer Riechel last week took the picture of Eugene Bregier and his new invention, a horizantal windmill. Monsieur Bregier is an aged man, with careworn countenance; a long gray beard that has perhaps been left to its own inclination while the man pondered and worked over his idea. The windmill is designed to furnish motive power that will at once and forever do away with such time-worn and annoying conveniences as horses, steam and electricity. Perhaps we exaggerate the claim of the inventor. He does, however, propose to attach his windmill to a conveyance of any kind, and have the latter move at any desired rate of speed, with or against the wind—it matters not, with Monsieur Bregier's windmill. The slightest current of air suffices, while a gale may blow without any defective results. The mill is constructed in a circular form, with eight or ten horizontal wings, or sails. one side of each fastenening on a central pole, and each pointing in a slightly opposite direction, so that that which fastens the outer edges of the top and bottom of the wings takes the form of a circle. Two governor balls surmount the contrivance. It is impossible to give a good idea without illustration. The motion of the wings or sails, as they spin round in regular flying dutchman shape, furnishes the motive power. It is thus easy to see how, with proper gearing, the vehicle to which the contrivance is attached can be made to run against the wind. It is unique, to say the least. M. Bregier has, thus, in a measure, conquered one force of nature He may live to see his device take the place of the present windmill.

St. Joseph's church fair opened at Kretzschmar hall Tuesday at 5 p. m., and closes to-night with a play. The ladies of St. Joseph's congregation had been at the hall all day Tuesday preparing for the opening, and when the doors were thrown afar for the public, the place already presented the appearance of a bazaar. Tables were set and laden with tempting viands that were soon being partaken of by scores of people. The typical fair scenes soon cropped out, one after another, until about 8 o'clock, when it was plainly visible that the bazaar was in full running order. The everpresent naive maiden with chances to sell was one of the principal menaces. She had a will of her own, and when she declared you would take a chance before leaving the hall, the proper thing was an immediate and unconditional surrender. The post office, fishing pond, grab bag, wheel of fortune, etc. were also prominent features. The first night, the least interesting, of course, still proved a financial success.

The second night—Wednesday—witnessed a much larger attendance. Hundreds of people from the country, besides town people, gathered at the hall. The crowd was immense. Dancing was inaugurated at 10. All the available space was occupied, and a hall twice the size would not have been too large. It was one of the largest gatherings ever held in the city. The receipts Wednesday night were double those of the evening previous. Excellent music was furnished. Dancing did not cease till about 3 this morning.

Thursday an excellent New Year dinner was served at the hall. In the afternoon various articles were auctioned to the highest bidder. The play, "Fabiola" is the princapal attraction this evening. Next week we give a report of the play, and publish the names of the winners of the different prizes.

The total receipts were $1,074.77.

The total receipts from contests alone, $636.98.

Mrs. David Paul and children and Louis Paul returned yesterday from Duluth. It is a sad home coming, for the husband and father was left in the cemetery at Duluth.

READ EACH INSTALLMENT!

The NEWS has no speculative object in view when it agitates the matter of county division. It is simply a matter of justice to a large portion of the people, and not a move to produce fat offices for the "boys," as alleged by the Crookston Times. The NEWS has never suggested any particular lines of division, but is willing to act with Fosston and East Grand Forks people and the people in the vicinity of these places. Crookston is reaping a harvest of shekels from the whole county so long as they can hold the present territory tributary to it, but judging from the sentiment expressed not only by Red Lake Falls people but many others throughout the county, the time is coming when the magnitude of the movement will not be a matter of ridicule. Of course the people feel loath to part with such a thriving, go backward town as Crookston, but the people of Polk county have made every effort to build it up and to no avail——they will now pull out—Red Lake Falls will be the county seat of a new county, and Crookston can not help it. "They cawn't, really."

Improved Passenger Service

Under the new time schedule of "the North-Western Line," C., St. P., M. & O.Ry., all passenger trains of this line make the trip between St. Paul and Chicago in less than 14 hours.

The Pullman and Wagner Vestibuled Limited, leaving St. Paul at 7:30 p. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13½ hours and from Chicago to St.Paul in 13 hours and 25 minutes.

The Daylight Express leaving St Paul at 7;45 a. m. makes the trip to Chicago in 13 hours and 50 minutes and from Chicago to St. Paul in 13 hours and 45 minutes.

This is the only line running all its trains in less than 14 hour between St. Paul and Chicago, and while this time is quick trains don't have to run at as high speed to make their time as on other lines, because this is shorter than any other line.

In addition to these facts this is the only line by which connections are assure in Chicago with all fast line trains from Chicag to the East and South in the morning and at night.

Note.—Fares by this line are always as low as by any other.

While it is a commendable act on the part of the farmers to place some brains at the head of the alliance, the magnitude of their wisdom is questioned when their act combines such a large amount of boodle with the brains

Happy New Year.

Yes we hope it will be a Happy New Year to all—and certainly there can be only good in good wishes. The year of Grace, 1890, is almost gone. Like all else in human life, it has been rather "mixed." Sometimes we "caught on," and everything "came our way." On other occaisions we bet our money on wrong hoeses and were sadly left. Sometimes wa have had lots of fun and at other times we hane found this to be a "hard and cruel world." We have made some new friends and lost some old ones. We made lots of hay, but our potatoes were few in a hill. and small at that. If we should strike a balance, we should find that on the whole we are considerably ahead—more sweet than bitter. For itself, "The Burlington" has done pretty well this year, thank you, an rejoyces in the acquaintance of many new patrons, while the old ones are still with us. Thankful for the past, we are yet more hopefnl for the future—and in the future when traveling by rail, take "The Only." Gen. Brooke telegraphed from Pine Ridge agency that he had purposely announced to the Indians in council the death of Sitting Bull, giving them the facts in detail, withholding nothing. They all recognized the justice of Sitting Bull's death and said it was a good thing that he had thus met his fate.

Since the discussion of the Mississippi constitution began in the senate there has been some intimation that the apportionment bill, which went through the house so easily is liable to run across some snags in the senate. It is quite possible that an attempt will be made to reduce the representation of Mississippi because the Mississippi constitution is evidence in itself of a denial of franchise to about half the legal voters under the United States constitution.

A Black Female Sampson.

Freedman's Town, a suburb of Houston Tex., boasts of a female Samson, who has repeatedly proven herself a match for any three men that have pitted their united strength against hers and who a few nights ago successfully routed Officer John Baxter and three of his assistants, all men of fine physique. The woman is a negress as black as night and of a stature slightly above average, but magnificently built and extraordinarily active. Her grip is such that she was able to break two of the bones of the hand of a woman with whom she had a fracas recently and it was on the police attempting to arrest her that she not only was ably to prevent them from putting the handcuffs on her, but taking the officer and his posse, one by one, flung them out of the house and closed and locked the door.

Baxter, in particular, is accounted a man of unusual strength and is of large build, but he says his muscles were as a child's when compared with those of the black amazon. The woman, whose name is Caroline Jenkins, is about thirty years old, and is the mother of seven children. She has been seen to pick up a barrel of flour and carry it a distance of some yards without appearing to overexert herself, and when tested was found to be able to break with ease a new grass rope an inch in diameter Since her exploit with the police it is said that a party of gentlemen propose traveling with her if she will go and give exhibitions of her strength, which is to be ascribed to no electrical of magnetic process, but to muscular development alone.

A TERRIBLE DEED.

Henry Reher, Near Fergus Falls Attempts to Slaughter His Whole Family.

Many Repeated Thrusts of His Butcher Knife Lay His Wife Silent in Death.

FERGUS FALLS, Minn., Special Telegram, Dec. 30.—A terrible tragedy occurred last night in the house of Henry Reher, who lived fifteen miles west of Fergus Falls and about the same distance from Carlisle.

Reher came home at about 9 o'clock from Elizabeth, where he ran a shoe shop, and, after some pleasantry about Christmas presents, drew two self-cocking revolvers and began shooting at his wife, son and daughters.

He hit his son twice in the arm and stabbed him in the back with a carving knife as he was trying to escape from the house.

The light went out in the midst of the shooting, and the three daughters got outside and hid themselves, one of them with a bullet wound in her shoulder.

Then Reher turned on his wife and stabbed her repeatedly with the knife. Aftward he went in search of his daughters, and not finding them came back to the house. His wife had crawled away, but he followed her and stabbed her again and again.

Finally he returned to the house and hanged himself to a beam, at the same time putting a bullet into his head.

The son managed to get to a neighbor's house two miles away and give the alarm. When the neighbors arrived they found Reher dead, his wife just dying and the three daughters still hiding. Physicians were summoned from Fergus Falls and Wahpeton and dressed the wounds of the two injured ones. Henry Reher, the son, will probably die from his wounds and loss of blood.

The family has some property, but is a rough lot. The son has served a term in the state prison for horse stealing and the girls do not bear an enviable reputation.

The family had numerous quarrels, and Reher went away a few weeks ago with the intention of not coming back. He went to Elizabeth and opened the shoe shop where he had since worked. He was perfectly sober at the time of the murder, and nobody can tell what his object was, unless it was simply a fit of desperation or frenzy.

He went home with the intention of doing the deed, because he took with him from Elizabeth the rope with with which he hanged himself, three revolvers and a butcher knife. No inquest will be held.

THE STRIKING SCOTS.

The Struggle Assumes New Phases but the End Still Seems Remote.

EDINBURGH, Dec. 30.—At a public meeting held in this city to-day, resolutions were passed expressing sympathy with the railway strikers. Many clergymen were present and delivered addresses. The passenger service continues to improve, and all mail trains are running regularly. There are, however, no signs of a settlement with the strikers. The strikers allege that men dismissed for color blindness have been reemployed by the railway companies. The Amalgamated Engineers' association has donated £3,000 to the strike fund. The Northeastern railway men on strike are being paid one day's pay weekly out of the fund.

Owing to the small amount of their Sunday traffic the railway companies were enabled to dispose of some arrears in the transportation of freights, coal, ore, etc.

At meetings of strikers held here yesterday and to-day it was resolved to stand firm, and the lord provost of the city was denounced as being an unscrupulous tool of the railway companies. The Midland company is sending engine drivers north to assist the Scotch railway companies.

At the meeting in Edinburgh to-day Principal Rainey, a reader of the Free church, presided. He declared that labor for the number of hours during which the men were compelled to work was inconsistent with health and a right use of human life. The meeting appointed a treasurer to receive donations for support of the strikers.

HULL, Dec. 30,—The striker here have resolved to accept the managers' offer of an increase of wages without a reduction of the number of working hours.

The probabilities are that the trouble is ended.

CHINESE MASONS.

A Novel Gathering in Indianapolis—Strange Sights Abound.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., Dec. 30.—To-day was a gala day in the local Chinatown, which is pretty well spread over the city. Sam Lung's laundry was the scene of the merrymaking preliminary to the Masonic ceremonies which will be celebrated to-morrow at the same place.

On Saturday Mong Du, a chief master and bishop, Chee Kung Tong, presiding elder, and Ah He, secretary of the national lodge of Chinese Free Masons, all citizens of San Francisco, arrived to preside over the degree work, which will be performed to-morrow in fine style. All day yesterday Chinamen were arriving from various parts of the state to either witness or participate in the grand ceremonies.

At early dawn Sam Lung arose, woke up his trusty lieutenants, Pong Chee and Sam Ki, and at once began preparing for today's banquet. Chickens were killed and dressed, rice was parboiled, nuts were cracked and various delicacies prepared for the original and tempting cuisine of the Flowery Kingdom. The banquet occurred at 2 o'clock to-day, Hop Sing of this city filling the chair of the grand symposiarch. All ate, drank and made merry at the feast, and were filled with good things. To-morrow the convention will reassemble, presided over by Mong Du, and the ceremonial rites will be performed. Several candidates from the city and neighboring towns will curl up their queues and ride the goat after the regular routine business is disposed of.

The session will last all day and night, winding up with an opportunity for those of a sporting nature to "buck the tiger," as fan tail will be a feature of the programme, as it was this evening.

SELAH CHAMBERLAIN DEAD.

A Name Once Prominently Before the People of Minnesota Recalled.

CLEVELAND, Dec. 30.—Selah Chamberlain, the well known railroad man, died last midnight, aged seventy-eight. Mr. Chamberlain was one of the wealthy and influential men of Cleveland.

He organized the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad company and built most of the lines comprising its system. BOOTH AND SMITH.

The Commander of the Salvation Army Rises to Remark.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—Gen. Booth, in a communication to the Times says:

"I deeply regret that misapprehension and some differences of opinion as to the best plan for working his department led Commissioner Smith to resign. In view of the serious obligations I have publicly undertaken, I naturally desire that the scheme shall be tried on lines entirely in harmony with my own ideas. I very highly esteemed Mr. Smith, and this extract from his letter shows no unfriendliness."

He quotes Commissioner Smith: "You need have no alarm regarding my intention. I contemplate no opposition to you. I just as earnestly as ever agree as to the end desired. We differ as to methods. You may reckon on me for any outside assistance I can give."

Gen. Booth, continuing, says: "A deed of trust for the funds will be executed in a few days. Nothing is yet done because the the necessary funds are only now assured." Gen. Booth adds that he hopes to answer criticisms of his scheme and deal with suggestions in a pamphlet which he expects to have published during January.

The Indian Conference.

CALCUTTA, Dec. 30.—The government of India has notified its officials not to attend the Calcutta conference, in which all castes are represented, and in deference to this order most of the Europeans have absented themselves. At the second sitting of the conference a petition was adopted asking the British parliament to pass Mr. Bradlaugh's bill making a part of the Indian council elective, after the viceroy shall have decided upon whom the franchise shall be conferred. A resolution favoring local option in excise matters was also adopted.

The conference unanimously resolved that the ages for the legal solemnization of marriage should be raised—for females to twelve years and for males to eighteen years—and the legal ages for the consummation of marriage to fourteen and twenty years respectively. The conference also resolved that the enforcing, by imprisonment, of decrees for restitution of conjugal right should be abolished.

More Cleveland Street Iniquity.

BERLIN, Dec. 30.—A theological student named Stephan Jirge is under arrest here on a charge of attempting to blackmail a high titled official. Jirge wrote the official demanding $3,750, on the ground that his health had been injured through indulgence in certain immoral acts in which the official was particeps criminis. The official apprised the police of the affair, when he was informed that Jirge had already voluntarily surrendered himself. Jirge maintains the truth of his accusation. The newspapers refer to the official as "Freiherr von W." The scandal excites widespread curiosity.

The house concurred in all the senate amendments to the urgent deficiency bill except the amendment providing for the payment of senate session employes, including the clerks to senators. The committee on appropriations recommended the concurrence in the amendment, with an amendment striking out the appropriation for the senate clerks, which virtually made them annual employes.

Monday December 22.

SENATE.

The senate committee on rules agrees upon a cloture, but just when it will be brought before the senate and what disposition will be made of it is uncertain.

The president transmitted to the senate a communication from the secretary of the interior in regard to the disposition of timber on certain Chippewa reservations in Wisconsin together with the draft of a bill prepared by the commissioner of Indian affairs to carry out his recommendations. The secretary says the provisions of the bill are similar to those of bills on the calendar on the same subject, and recommends that one of the bills pass.

HOUSE.

It is probable that a concurrent resolution will be past in the house providing for a recess of the house until the holidays end. The consent of the senate will be necessary before this resolution can become effective The consent will probably be given, but the senate will not adjourn. Should the resolution fail the house will take successive recesses for three days at a time during the holidays. A large number of members of the house have been informed that the resolution will be called up, and it is said there has been no objection made to it.

The legislative history of the year practically closed to-day. Friday December 26.

SENATE.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22.—The holiday season has affected the senate heavily in the matter of attendance, and but seven senators put in an appearance to-day. HOUSE.

The house to-day did nothing but meet and adjourn till Tuesday.

A New Submarine Boat.

DETROIT, Dec. 2.—The Detroit Boat company is constructing a submarine craft, of which great things ase expected. The vessel is forty feet long, nine feet beam and fourteen feet depth of hold. The mechanism is similar to that of a submarine torpedo boat. Storage batteries will be used for storing oxygen, giving light and furnishing the motive power.

The improvement over the torpedo boat is claimed in the buoyancy of the craft, which will come to the surface as soon as the electric meter is stopped, whereas the machinery of the torpedo boat must be working to bring it to the surface of the water. Besides a screw wheel at the stern will be two wheels on either side of the craft. Turning an electric switch will cause the boat to rise.

It is being built as a pleasure craft, but if it proves successful the government will be requested to consider its adoption as a torpedo boat.

D., Special Telegram, Dec. 26. —The clerk of the supreme court has discovered that under the statutes the election of a United States senator cannot be held until the second Tuesday after the meeting of the legislature, which postpones the election until Jan. 20. The theft is supposed to have been committed by a hired man, who hails from Minneapolis. The members of the Waseca County Anti-Thief society are in pursuit, and a liberal reward is offered for the capture of the thief.

A meeting held at Albert Lea drew out quite a number of citizens interested in the establishment of a beet sugar factory, with headquarters there. Dr. W. C. Voght was appointed to interview the capitalists with preference to the matter. Prof. Adolph Meyer, with the assistance of J. A. Deragisch was instructed to frame a circular regarding the new industry, to be printed and circulated among all interested.

Several of the state papers have suggested that there be held a convention of representative business men of the state to take some action in regard to Minnesota's representation at the world's fair at Chicago. This should be done at once. Minnesota is a state worthy of first-class advertising, and it should be so represented at the coming fair that people will be able, at a glance even, to realize the vast resourses of the state and the advantages offered to settlers.

Sheriff Lenfest at Anoka captured about $450 worth of goods at the bankrupt store of A Lobel, who recently made an assignment. Acting under the advisement of Attorney General Clapp, Gov. Merriam has decided to declare the adoption of the constitutional amendment, making the verdict of five-sixths of a jury in civil actions valid. The attorney general bases his advice upon the supreme court decision of 1876, that "a majority of those present and voting" means a a majority of those voting on the penning amendment. It is believed, however, that the decision of 1876 was not sound law, and that cases decided under this jury amendment may be upset.

A sensation was caused at Lake Benton, by the arrest of Hamilton Dehart, charged with the murder of Henry Pretre, a bachelor, three years ago. One morning in January, 1888, Pretre's neighbors discovered his body burned to a crisp in the ruins of his barn. Signs of foul play were present. The authorities were appealed to, but took no action, and the theory that his lantern was overturned by accident and he met his death while trying to rescue his stock was finally accepted by the people generally. Charles Pretre, a brother of the dead man, it seems, did not share the common belief relative to his brother's death, but suspected foul play. Acting on his suspicions, he has investigated the matter until he thought he had sufficient evidence to justify a complaint.

Hon. J. S. Pillsbury, says that the Soo branches would be extended to Bismarck and Jamestown next season. The company contemplates building about 800 miles of road in the Dakotas, which will be important to the lumber trade. The Soo will be the first line to distribute the Dakota coal over the southern half of the state.

Hon. J. C. White, well known to the temperance people of this state as the secretary of the "non-partisan prohibition alliance," is lying very ill at his home in Casselton, having been confined to his bed for more than one year past from diseases resulting from wounds received in the service. An effort is being made to secure for him an increase of pension.

The Fargo Argus says of "Jimmy" Emmons, who was one of the three pioneers who started the machinery of Burleigh county: "Editor Emmons, the irrepressible, is now in Nebraska. He was a typical old timer, an eccentric genius or crank; a past trader, saloonist, editor, all round good hearted, honest boomer. He has an imperishable memento in Emmons county."

Eight Michigan farmers from near Ypsilanti came to this state eight years ago with but three or four head of cows among them. They can now count up over 400 head of cattle and horses which they have raised and which figure as a profit. They have lived through the toughest of the prairie privations, and now see their way out by the yearly increase in the flocks of sheep, cattle and horses.

Col. Plummer has been appointed a special immigration agent of the Great Northern railroad and will make a tour of the east this winter in a special car. The car will contain samples of the products of this state, which will be exhibited and explained by an expert who will accompany the colonel. Col. Plummer will confine himself to public speeches, setting forth the advantage of the state as an agricultural and stock country. He will probably start about the 1st of January.

The jury at Fargo, brought in a verdict of $2,000 in favor of Louise Patrich against August Wichman. This action was brought for $5,000 for breach of promise and seduction. The plaintiff is a poor German girl; defendant is the son of a wealthy German family, and has married since the alleged engagement was broken. The trial has attracted considerable attention, and the case will probably be taken to the supreme court.

Stories of suffering in Dickey county are strongly denied by the officials of that county in a letter to the Fargo Argus. After the most thorough investigation it is found that although crops were exceedingly poor, still enough was raised to pay running expenses and carry farmers over until next year, so far as food and clothing was concerned, but seed will undoubtedly be needed next spring. So far as actual suffering for necessaries of life is concerned, not a single case could be found.

John S. Murphy, Indian agent at Fort Berthold, has asked for the protection of troops, as the Berthold Indians, coached by renegades from Standing Rock, have become affected with the Messiah craze and are into the ghost dance to stay. These Indians have hitherto been the most peaceful in the Northwest. They are composed of the remnants of the Gros Ventres, Arickarees and Mandans. It is understood they are to order the whites to leave the reservations.

A fatal stabbing affray took place just over the state border from Gretun, when Michael Dumont, nephew of Grbriel Dumont, of Riel rebellion fame, was fatally stabbed by Nicholas Damm. A dispute arose between the two men over some trouble that occurred three years ago, Damm struck Dumont with his fist, and, upon Dumont retaliating, Damm pulled his knife and with an upward motion stabbed Dumont in the groin. Dumont died in an hour, when Damm was arrested and lodged in the Pembina jail. Both parties had been drinking heavily.

Of the forty houses comprising the village of Rickardsville but seven are occupied as saloons, and the need of another establishment of this kind has long been felt. A resident of the neighborhood the other day determined to supply the aching void. According he bought a frame saloon a mile from Rickardsville and undertook to move it into the village on wheels. While the work was under way the proprietor went off on a spree and before he sobered up the wheels froze in the mud. The saloon now stands in the middle of the highway near the village and is doing a rushing business.

Cut His Own Tongue Out.

New York World's Los Angeles, Cal., Special: A strange case of self-mutilation came to light to-day, in which a man who is not suspected of insanity cut his tongue out with a razor.

The act was committed on Sunday morning in a boarding house on Broadway, where the stranger, who gave the name of Wilson but refused to give his initials, took a room three weeks ago. During his stay he lived on bread and water, although he was known to have had plenty of money. On Sunday, for the first time since his arrival, he rang his bell, and the landlady, in responding, found on the outside of his door a newspaper on the margin of which had been scribbled: "Send for a surgeon to stop the bleeding. On the room being entered the lodger was found bending over a wash basin with blood pouring from his mouth. He was perfectly calm and was attempting to stop the hemorrhage with a wet handkerchief. A bloody razor lay on the bed, and spots of blood were on the carpet.

A doctor was called and the man's injuries were dressed. He stood the painful ordeal with wonderful nerve, for, while the flesh quivered under the surgeon's needle, the man himself gave no indication of suffering. The severed portion of the tongue had been thrown away by the man, whose every act showed the utmost deliberation. He had shaved himself cleanly, taken a bath, carefully dressed himself with the exception of his coat, and then evidently seized his tongue, pushed the razor into his mouth as far as it would go, and with a quick slash cut off the offending member.

The accomplishment of the deed seems to have been the man's sole aim, as he carried out the surgeon's directions for treatment to the letter. Calling upon the surgeon next day, the latter endeavored to gain the mysterious man's confidence, but he only gave a shrug of the shoulders, and on a little tablet which he brought with him asked for his bill, which he paid. He then returned to the lodging house and endeavored to call the landlady to accept money for the trouble that he had put her to by his singular act. He then bade her good-by and she heard nothing of him until this morning, when she received an envelope containing a money order for $25 from Yuma, which must have come from him. She describes him as a scholarly, polished man of dark complexion, medium height, of requisite politeness, and in her opinion he is a priest. He held no intercourse with any one, and seemed simply to have come to the city to carry out his singular scheme of self-mutilation. He had expensive baggage with him. No clue of any kind can be found which will indicate who he was or why he cut his tongue out.

Like a Chinaman.

Chicago Herald's Muncie Special: On East Adams street, this city, resides John Quincy Adams, a widower, aged sixty-five years, who for a long time has been surviving on nourishment received from the meat of rats, which he catches in traps distributed throughout his neighborhood so thickly that his catches enable him to use none but the choicest fat young ones, which are decapitated like a chicken skinned and prepared by the old fellow like a housewife would a squirrel. The old ones, not so fine, are boiled down for lard with which to mix his pie and bread dough. When questioned, the old fellow stated that a long time ago he concluded, if Chinamen could eat rats, he could do likewise; but his wife and children objected, and until their departure ten years ago he was deprived of the meat. Of the meat he says: "It is as fine as any wild game to be had." He delights in showing the nice ones, when captured, to his colored widow tenant, who occupies a part of the house. Adams, with his six children, moved here twenty-seven years ago from near Piqua, Ohio, a wealthy man, but soon lost what he had in the collapse of a machine shop. Since then his wife has died, his children are married and gone, some he knows not where. It is thought by many poverty has driven him to his awful diet, but he boastingly relates how easy it is to live on his rent, $1.50 per week, and save money. The old man's present sickness, which he calls la grippe, caused the above discovery of that and of the awful filthy quarters he occupies.

A Wealthy Bootblack.

Denver News: It isn't every day that a colored man may be seen who is rated at $25,000—who has a well stocked farm of 380 acres, a fat bank account and at the same time is putting in fifteen hours a day at a bootblack stand. Such a man is making his home in Denver. His name is Jacob Shower and every day he plies the blacking brush at a chair on Lawrence street, in front of the Gibbs house. Shower is a full-blooded African of large size and powerful frame. He is a man upon whom forty-nine years have rested lightly, and yet his has been a life of romance and vicissitude, whose recital would scarcely be credited were it not that the strange facts are corroborated by scars upon his body and by an honorable membership in the G. A. R., where the bootblack-ranchman is recognized as a man whose word is as good as his bond.

SINGLE TAX DEPARTMENT.

MR. VAN GRIP'S FORTUNE.

In 1840 Mr. Van Grip purchased from the Van Snort estate a lot of land fronting on Broadway, below Fulton street, for $25,000. An old building stood on the lot at that time, and Mr. Van Grip had it torn down and a new building erected in its stead. The new building cost $100,000 and created no little stir and gossip in New York in those days. Besides giving a minute description of it in their news columns, the Bugle and Bladder treated the subject editorially and in glowing terms praised the enterprise and public spirit of Mr. Van Grip, and wound up with a wish that New York were blessed with more men like him. Enterprise and public spirit were not Mr. Van Grip's only virtues. He was a religious, God-fearing gentleman, a loving husband, a good father, a thorough business man who was not too proud to look after his own affairs, which he always kept in the straightest order, keeping accurate accounts of all his transactions so that at any moment he could tell exactly how he stood with respect to any particular one of them; in short, he was a model man—a man to be looked up to and copied.

Years rolled by, bringing poverty, hunger and rags to many and riches, plenty and fine linen to a few. The civil war broke out, and thousands of hot-headed patriots left home and kindred to sacrifice their lives on the altar of freedom. Hitherto it had been a cast iron rule with Mr. Van Grip to personally represent himself on all occasions where matters of any moment were at issue, but in this case he was satisfied to appear by proxy. So he hired an agent to represent him at the "front," and remained at home himself to look after the interests of society and to see that the business of the metropolis was carried on in a ship-shape manner. The public weal demanded this, and, as Mr. Van Grip was a heavy tax-payer, the city could not very well spare him. He was one of her representative men.

In 1886 Mr. Van Grip died, in the language of the eminent divine who officiated at the funeral services, "universally regretted," and was peacefully laid to rest in the family plot, where a handsome marble shaft records his many virtues for the edification of future generations.

Early in 1887 the lot of land and the building (now an old one) on Broadway were sold in partition proceedings for the snug little sum of $350,000. I have incidentally remarked above that Mr. Van Grip kept accurate accounts of all his transactions, and I here take the liberty of glancing at the accounts relative to this particular one, not to satisfy any morbid curiosity, but simply with a view of learning a lesson from the enterprise and public spirit of the exemplary gentleman.

The account is written in a neat hand, every "i" is dotted and every "t" is crossed, and it is most beautifully ruled off in red ink. On the debit side are entered payments for taxes, water rates, insurance, repairs, etc., and interest at the legal rate on the $125,000 invested; and on the credit side appear the amounts of rent received. For the first three years (1841-3) the debit and credit sales of the accounts exactly balance. During the following seven years (1844-50) the credits exceed the debits by $5,500; from 1851 to 1860 the excess of credits over debits is $11,000; from 1861 to 1870 this excess amounts to $12,500; from 1871 to 1880 the excess amounts up to $14,000; and from 1881 to 1886, inclusive, it is $8,000; the grand total of excess of rents over and above payments for taxes, insurance, water rates, repairs, etc., and the amounts which Mr. Van Grip allowed himself for interest on the principal sum invested during the forty-six years being $51,000.

Now let us work out two little problems, one in subtraction and the other in addition. From the price at which the property was sold in 1887, namely, $350,000, deduct the cost price, namely, $125,000, and there remains $225,000, to which add $51,000, and we find the net profit on this little transaction was $276,000. Of course, I have not taken into consideration interest on the surplus of receipts over disbursements which accrued annually from 1844 to 1886, and of which surplus Mr. Van Grip was sufficiently enterprising and public spirited to take appropriate advantage.

Two hundred and seventy-six thousand dollars! Phew! To think of it makes my head swim. What genius! What enterprise! What public spirit! Compare this with the puny efforts of twenty pigmy contemporaries of Mr. Van Grip. Those twenty clods of humanity started in the race with him. They drudged and delved for twenty years (1840-60), and as the result of their drudging and delving averaged $525 a year per man, they all earning during the twenty years $210,000, which these good-for-nothing fellows squandered as fast as they earned it. The war broke out and the whole twenty marched off to the "front," from which six of them returned alive to resume their drudging and delving. For the next twenty-two years (1865-86) the total amount earned by those six nobodies was $66,000, or $500 yearly a man. This they likewise spent as fast as they earned it, in riotous living and pampering of the flesh. And then those six nobodies died and were buried out of sight and into their miserable graves, whereon not as much as a wooden stake is placed to remind the passer-by that such pigmies lived.

Here we have the bright example of one enterprising, public-spirited gentleman, earning and saving on one of his transactions as much as twenty nobodies earned and squandered. Just think of it!

We have said one of his transactions, for this was only one of a number of like ones in which Mr. Van Grip had been engaged during those forty-six years. When that worthy gentleman died his estate was found to be worth over $2,000,000—"all in realty," as the lawyers expressed it. Any reader of the The Standard, if he wishes to form a fair estimate of the enterprise and public spirit of this great man, can do so, approximately at least, by working out a little problem in the rule of three. For instance, suppose the earnings of Mr. Van Grip over and above those of ordinary men for those forty-six years to form a like proportion of the $2,000,000 to that which they actually did of the $350,000, we can find out in a jiffy how much his entire earnings during that period amount to. Let us see:

350,000: 2,000,000: : 276,000.

Multiply our second term by our third and divide the product by our first. There you are, sir, $1,577,142.85; that is the amount of Mr. Van Grip's extra earnings during the forty-six years.

Again, if it takes twenty nobodies in uncertain circumstances and conditions forty-six years to earn $276,000, how many nobodies, working under similar circumstances and conditions and for a similar period, will it take to earn $1,477,142.85?

Multiply our second term by our third and divide the product by our first. Answer 114 78857-276,000 nobodies. A fraction of a nobody does not amount to much, so will discard the fraction and call it 114.

It warms the cockles of my heart to contemplate him. Just think of it. He earned and saved more than 114 of the ordinary run of men earned and squandered.

Pondering over these figures an idea occurred to me, and as I am not one of those who keep their light under a bushel, I give it to the readers of The Standard. It is this: The sole object of life nowadays is money. Granted. There are over 50,000,000 human beings in these United States at the present writing. Now, suppose that one-fifth of these are able-bodied men (which they are not, but we will suppose so), engaged in a terribly earnest pursuit of that object, and suppose again that in every 115 of these 10,000,000 there is one Mr. Van Grip and 114 incapable nobodies. Now let us figure out that and see what it comes to:

Proceed as we have done above and we find that there are 86956 12-23 Mr. Van Grips and 9,913,043 11-23 incapable nobodies who are unwilling or unable to accomplish any thing toward the object referred to—money.

Now I have come to the idea. Listen: Let those 9,913,043 11-23 incapable nobodies be quietly choked, or burned, or, perhaps, it would be cheaper to dump them into the sea, and then after that has been done let us strangle all the nobody infants as fast as they appear and save and carefully raise the Van Grip infants; if—but, hang it, here comes this terrible "if!" How are we to recognize the Van Grip infants? There's the rub. Perhaps some reader of The Standard may devise a mode of obviating this little difficulty.

Some men are curious animals. I related the facts above written to my friend Pete Drudger, and instead of appreciating the enterprise and public spirit of Mr. Van Grip as they deserve, he metaphorically tore that respectable gentleman's memory to tatters, said he never did an honest day's work in his life, said he was nothing but a bloated spider who lay idly in his hole, and watched an opportunity to prey upon the poor nobodies, said that the $1,557,142.85 of right belonged to the 114 nobodies I spoke of, then branched off into some nonsense about "unearned increment," or some such stuff, and finally wound up by calling me a fool, and said that if my "idiotic idea" about burning, choking and drowning could, by any possible means, be carried into execution, I should be the first victim, as he had never known a more incapable nobody than I am; whereupon I left him. There is no use in trying to reason with such men.

OWEN FITZSIMONS.

The single tax idea is steadily commending itself to earnest thinking men. It is a rank injustice that a man should hold property vacant, with nominal taxes, and gain the increment of value produced by the improvements made by his neighbors, who pay taxes upon those improvements. The bed rock of taxation is this; no tax on the products of labor. This principle is world-wide. It applies with equal force to the town, the State, the nation, the world. By its adoption labor would receive a healthy stimulus, and would create wealth as never before. Throughout the world the burdens of taxation have fallen upon labor, and in all forms of indirect taxation the burden falls with almost equal weight upon all, regardless of their circumstances. But place this burden upon land values only and at once the basis of taxation becomes absolutely equitable, land speculation becomes unprofitable, and the inducements to labor to place improvements upon the land and to advance to its more general ownership are vastly multiplied.—Building and Realty.

WHEN the idea of individual ownership, which so justly and naturally attaches to things of human production, is extended to land, all the rest is a mere matter of development. The strongest and most cunning easily acquire a superior share in this species of property, which is to be had, not by production, but by appropriation, and in becoming lords of the land they become necessarily lords of their fellow-men. The ownership of land is the basis of aristocracy. It was not nobility that gave land, but the possession of land that gave nobility. All the enormous privileges of the nobility of medieval Europe flowed from their position as the owners of the soil.—Progress and Poverty.

"To whomsoever the soil at any time belongs, to him belong the fruits of it," is a truth that becomes more and more apparent as population becomes denser and invention and improvement add to productive power; but it is everywhere a truth—as much in our new States, as in the British Islands or by the banks of the Indus.—Progress and Poverty.

THE tax on land values is the only tax of any importance that does not distribute itself. It falls upon the owners of land, and there is no way in which they can shift the burden upon any one else.—Progress and Poverty.

MORE ABOUT ALUMINUM.

The Wonderful Possibilities of the Little-Known Metal.

Aluminum still promises to become the "metal of the age," notwithstanding the difficulties that have been met in producing it. Of late it has been made the subject of numerous and valuable experiments. A prominent French metallurgist has been for several years conducting experiments with the metal, and expresses it as his belief that it is destined to become one of the most useful of metals, displacing even iron and steel. One of the experiments which he has been conducting, and which he has succeeded in bringing to a successful issue, is the plating of other metals with aluminum, and, in view of the prominence in commercial interests of this new metal, the process and effect of his system may be of interest, and in substance is as follows:

"The metal to be plated, be it iron, steel, copper, or what not, is first thoroughly cleaned in an acid bath. Then it is placed in a compound bath, the ingredients of which are borate of soda, hydrated alumina and some kind of fusible flux. Then it goes into a muffle, having several trays or flues for the admission of vapors and escape of gases generated during the process. The muffle is heated to a high pitch, and salts of aluminum, generally in the shape of a chloride, are heated in a clay vessel until they vaporize; the vapors are then conducted into the muffle by one of the flues. As a result, aluminum is deposited on the prepared heated metal. To prevent oxidation, nitrogen is forced into the muffle along with the chloride of aluminum vapor. Only a small quantity of waste gases is formed during the process, and these, together with the surplus nitrogen, escape through the flues, but are collected and may be again used in other ways. It is said that this method is very thorough; so thorough, indeed, that not only is a coating of aluminum deposited on the surface of the iron or copper, but much of the precious metal is actually absorbed by the heated and expanded iron or copper, so that an actual alloy is formed, which gradually shades off to a surface of pure aluminum.

"The value of this process ought to be very great. This coating of aluminum is found to increase very materially the strength of the object to which it is applied. It is of utility in machinery, for axles, etc., because the aluminum is anti-frictional. Then it is not tarnished by either acids or alkalies, nor eaten into by them. This fact makes an aluminum plating most dersirable for household utensils of all kinds. Curiously enough, it both conveys heat more rapidly and retains it longer than almost any other known metal, which makes it of special value in cooking utensils. M. Brin is enthusiastic on the subject, and looks for the coming of an ilumium age, when this wonderful metal shall supersede all others for almost all the ueses of mankind."

Homemade Baskets.

There is a way to make good baskets at home and pretty and cheap, too, out of corn husks—thick outer husks for strong baskets, and for lighter and finer ones the white inner parts. These must be wrapped for an hour or so in a damp towel, and then cut into strips of equal width. Make an ordinary braid with six or more strips, which may be doubled, or even trebled, for greater strength. Thread a needle with heavy, waxed lined thread, and having dampened the braid, form it into an oval, five or six inches long and three wide, for the bottom of the basket, and sew the adjoining edges of the braid together, as in a straw hat, but don't overlap them. Go on coiling and stitching for the sides of the basket, widening the opening until the basket is deep enough.

The handles are made of a heavy, three stranded braid, which is sowed all around the top of the basket, just inside, and looped at the middle of each side.

For ornament wind the handles with gay colored ribbon or braid, put a box plaiting of the same around the top and work a bunch of flowers on one side in bright worsteds, with long stitches. The opposite side may have a letter or a name.

A Breach of Decency.

James Hamilton once had a bachelor establishment at Cairo. A week after he had occupied his house, with only his man-servant to wait on him, he was visited by the sheikh of the quarter, a venerable Egyptian of imposing appearance, says the San Francisco Argonaut. After the usual compliments and the coffee and pipes were disposed of, the Sheikh el Belled commenced by expressing his regret that his Arab neighbors, while admitting the inoffensive character and deportment of the Frank, objected to remaining there. "On what ground?" said Hamilton. "Why," replied the sheikh, "they say you are not a moral man!" "Why," said the astonished Englishman, "no woman has ever set foot in my house since I have occupied it!" "Yes," responded the sheikh, and that is the very reason they give. They say you have no harem in your house, and therefore must prove a troublesome neighbor. If a man has no harem, he must meddle with his neighbor's. It is not decent."

PART I—CHAPTER IV.

DAVID AND JONATHAN.

"I remember our compact," Everett answered gravely.

The whistle of the down river steamer blew promptly at Standish landing, sending its shout through every room of Rose Villa, and scarce had the echo come back from the hills behind when she was again moving cityward.

The whistle had been heard by both girls in Bennie's dainty boudoir above the porch, and it brought her father and aunt to the door to greet the visitors. Sincere and cordial welcome they received from both, Miss Tabitha's recent annoyance melting in surprise at their changed appearance.

"Why, Dale!" she exclaimed: "if you are not really a man and an officer! How you have changed! And you, too, Adrien! Upon my word, I should not have known either of you!"

"Because I also am 'an officer and a gentleman,' Miss Tabitha?" queried the Creole, with a sunny laugh. "Well, I'll promise never to show you 'conduct unworthy' of either again. I'll never be the mauvais sujet I was in Paris."

"And I will go on his bond for it," Dale added. "But it does seem strange, doesn't it? Lieut. Latour, First United States cavalry, and Lieut. Everett, of the Engineers!"

"That's right; drop the unnecessary Brevet Second," laughed Adrien, as Miss Tabitha proffered meat and drink and warm welcome.

Few contrasts could be imagined stronger than that between these two new defenders of the flag of the free. Dale Everett's strong, clear cut features were somewhat too pale from close confinement at study; but, spite of that, the nameless something, always felt, but not to be described, spoke plainly the splinter of Plymouth Rock. A large head, with crisp, fair hair, surmounted a tall, strong limbed frame, wherein the elasticity of the American tempered the latent power of the Englishman. But especially in the eyes and mouth the inner man spoke out, the calm intensity of gaze hinting something behind it which might on occasion, gleam out in powerful, even cruel flash; the thin lips—tender now in their mobile curves—belied the long oval of the jaw if they could not set hard and relentless as steel.

Slim, lithe, with a sinuous grace in every movement that told of perfect muscular work, Adrien Latour's bronzed olive skin showed the veins beneath on neck and brow. So varying were the dark eyes as to defy detection of real color; the small head, with its black crown of silken hair, never rested still on the firm neck, and the strong brown hands showed sensibility combined with nervous power.

In the plain uniform of their new rank the two men standing side by side in the bright June sunshine were absolute types of those antipodal strengths of the republic—action and thought. Strong, steadfast and enduring, the Puritan scion was the man to breast and break down barriers on his life road by sheer endeavor. The nervous impetuosity of the Creole would aim to clear them at a single bound. Thrown and baffled, he would try again, so long as the hot strength did not burn away of its own fire; but he would never pause to tear down the obstacle, or turn to seek a by-path.

Born in bitter struggle, matured by years of laborious trial, the high caste New Englander showed in Dale Everett—a silent, incarnate strength. Diametric opposites—triple result of blood, life and climate—spoke as plainly through every movement of his Creole classmate. Even the pose of the two men told its tale. Resting carelessly on a chair back, the graceful form quite still and the head courteously bent, Adrien Latour listened to Miss Tabitha with rather vague intensity. Only the nervous tap of the thin soled boot told that sex, not individual, claimed that endurance he was fast losing. Dale Everett was running over the story of graduation and commission to Mr. Standish, his quiet position and frank talk tempered by not too pronounced respect for the latter's age.

But both the black eyes and the blue turned more than once impatiently toward the door, till at last Everett, with his blunt candor, queried so suddenly that the spinster bounced in her seat:

"Where in the world is Bennie?"

"I suppose," Latour added quickly, "we should say 'Miss Standish,' now that we are 'great, grown up' people."

There was a telegraphic glance between brother and sister-in-law. His said, quite as plainly as helplessly: "What shall I say? How explain the indecent haste?"

Hers replied, quite as plainly and with added sharpness: "Nonsense, Brother Standish! See what my tact will accomplish!"

Then Miss Tabitha strode across the room, took her brother's arm—adding emphasis by a sharp pinch—and moved toward the door.

"Make yourself perfectly at home, Dale," she said, "and you also, Adrian. All will be explained as it is; and, being as it is, such is for the best! Bennie, under these circumstances, cannot explain for herself, and so her natural guardians speak for her."

With which oracular utterance and a fresh pinch on the supporting arm, Miss Fay led her brother off, unresisting prey. Both of the young men stared at her departing figure; then both spoke in characteristic style.

"Mon Dieu! Tab is a sphinx!" Latour exclaimed with a low laugh; "but hang me if I shall stake my life on unraveling her riddle! Why, Dale, the old girl is rustier than ever, and hard as her Egyptian sister?"

The other answered in his quieter way:

"There must be some reason for her embarrassment, though. She can't mean to leave the invaders in possession in this fashion. She'll soon return for another broadside, so here goes to sit down for a siege." And he picked up The Herald and sat in Edith's vacated chair.

"Ten to one Bennie is out there," Latour answered, restlessly walking to the window and peering wistfully into the garden. "Anyway, I can smoke a cigar out doors. And, Dale, if I meet her first"——

He threw away the fusee he had just struck, strode over and looked steadily in his friend's face, without completing the sentence.

"I remember our compact," Everett answered, gravely. Rising to his feet, he laid both hands on Latour's shoulders, as he added: "It is too full of meaning to both our futures for me to forget it one instant today. But, Ad, come what may, we shall both be better men for it."

"Dear old fellow!" cried Adrien, impulsively. "But how much easier it would be did we know which one of us it is!"

"It may prove neither," the other answered, doubtfully. "Women like her are never lightly won, and neither of us has ever yet spoken"——

"In words, no," broke in the Creole, "but she must know. Why, all last summer she never cared for other men. I tell you, Dale, my faith in her is next to that in our holy church! She never could trifle with us!"

"Never, I believe on my soul! But, Ad, if you are right, and it prove to be you, I believe you know I am man enough to say God bless you, with my heart as well as my lips! We will still be—brothers!"

Their hands came together in firm clasp, as the Creole echoed the one word—

"Brothers!".

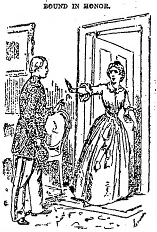
Without even another look he strode through the window, lighted his cigar, and Dale listened to the quick, firm step that spurned the gravel in its eager quest. Then he threw himself on the sofa, with a cloud on his face.

"We must soon know," he said aloud. "And if, as he says, it be one of us, will the other have the strength to keep that pledge? Well"—and the cloud cleared away—"there is no use in borrowing trouble. It finds us soon enough!"

He dropped back on the sofa and picked up the paper. The exciting "long session" of that summer was rapidly aligning into strictly sectional factions, and the thoughtful young soldier began to believe that so much of such talk must at last end in action. To him the telegrams meant that or nothing. The little French clock on the mantel ticked with remorseless monotone. The balmy air was gently soporific; the distant hum of the Hudson fell drowsily upon his ear; a stray bee in the cornice buzzed him into that half way stage from which the little clock relentlessly ticked him into sleep.

PART I—CHAPTER V.

BOUND IN HONOR.



"Remember! I trusted to your honor!"

Bennie had heard the steps upon the gravel, too; and the stillness below assured her both men had left the house. She ran lightly down the steps and crossed the parlor.

Camp habit supreme, Dale Everett sat bolt upright, with his dream still in midaction, ere he opened his eyes.

"Dale!"

"Bennie!" He had sprung from the sofa and taken both her hands, and was gazing intently on the downcast lids. She raised them slowly, looking at him earnestly, but without a blush upon her pale face.

"Dale, have they told you?"

"Who? Told what?"

Twenty-four is apt to be abrupt, rather than logical. And as she did not answer he hurried on:

"But I have something to tell you, Bennie, and it must be told now. How I have refrained so long I cannot understand. It is always with me; I was dreaming of it now." He glanced quickly round, fearful that they might be interrupted, more fearful that his courage would desert him if he did not finish then. "Bennie, ever since we were children you must have seen—in all these late years you must have felt—what you are to me!"

The girl turned her face aside and half raised her hands to stay him, but the strong clasp of his own upon them held her still, and the eager light of his eyes burned down on her drooped lids as he went on, never pausing:

"You must hear me out! Only Adrien knows my secret now. God knows it is the only one I ever kept long from my tent mate. But if I do not speak now it may be too late. Bennie, dear, I am no longer a boy. Today I am free to act for myself—free to tell you—I love you!"

With a quick gesture she freed her hands, turning farther away from him. A little shiver passed through her, but the man heeded nothing but his own eager pleading.

"Since boyhood I have loved you, my darling! You have grown into my heart, have become part of my being. Love for you has been my stay and my hope. All my study, all my ambition has been to make me free—and worthy—to say, as I do now from my very soul, I love you!"

Again the shiver ran through the girl's blood; again the man, wrapped in the glow of his own passion, heeded it not.

"Only my God and Adrien knew this. Now that you know it, will you speak to me?"

For the first time she raised her face to his; a suffering, hunted look in the blue eyes. Then, with a dull sob, she dropped into a chair and the shudder shook her in its strong grasp. Bending over her, Dale Everett, his face full of tenderness, his voice husky with suspense, whispered:

"Bennie, what does this mean? You do not—oh, darling! you do not despise me?"

The girl slowly raised to his a face far different from the bright one he loved so well. Intense feeling trembled on the lips, the eyes brimmed with tears and the voice faltered that began:

"Dale, we are old, old friends"——

Mistaking either the emotion or the words, the young soldier hesitated one second; the next his strong arms held her close and his lips pressed her forehead.

"My darling! My own Bennie at last! This pays for all—for doubt—delay"——

"Let me go, Dale!" she sobbed, struggling. "You must not! You have no right"——

He recoiled as if struck heavily. She stood still and trembling, with downcast eyes.

"Was I mistaken?" he asked huskily.

She only bowed her head lower still.

"Speak," he said, more calmly. "Do not be afraid to say what I am not afraid to hear." But the voice belied the brave words it framed, and he clinched his hands hard while Bennie twice essayed to speak. Then she said almost inaudibly:

"I am to be married!"

"Married!" Only one word in a low cry.

She covered her face with locked hands, and turned away with the low sob:

"Today!"

For some moments Dale Everett stood dazed. Gradually over his face came the awakening to her true meaning. A deep, gasping breath rent his chest. Then he passed his hand over his eyes, but when he spoke it was almost his natural voice that asked:

"And you love the man?"

"No." Bennie obeyed the strong will like a little child.

"Who is he?"

"Mr. Mason, papa's friend."

"And you know that he is buying you, as he would a horse, or a dog?"

The woman's voice was scarce audible, but her head sunk lower still.

"What matter?"

The man's face did not change. There was no tremor, but infinite contempt, in his next words:

"No; you have no heart."

Then for the first time Bennie raised her bowed head. Whether the words touched or the tone stung her she herself hardly knew, but she looked in Dale Everett's face with a glance as firm as his own, while infinitely gentle.

"Dale," she said softly, "you will forget this disappointment; time will cure it for you; but for me there is no time, no cure! Your words hurt me more than you dream. Please unsay them before we part for—for the sake of the old days. Oh, Dale, if you knew all you would not hate—you would pity me!"

He was still relentless. "You have no need for pity; you have no heart! I only spoke the truth."

Then she turned to him, resolve on the pale features, but she said gently:

"Until today I doubted whether I had a heart. But when I looked this awful marriage in the face an hour ago—oh, Dale! to my bitter anguish I found that I had, and without my knowledge it had gone out wholly, utterly to another, and that other not my plighted husband!"

Even through the suffering in the girl's voice there was defiant resolve to bear it all now.

"Who is—that other?" The strong man trembled—half in hope, half in doubt—as he whispered the question, stretching eager hands, as if to clutch the answer. The girl turned her face aside once more, but the low voice was very tender and without one tremor as it formed the two words,

"Adrien Latour!"

For a single instant the color fell out of Dale Everett's face, leaving it ashen dull. Then the old blood that had flowed on Roundhead battlefield and warmed stiffening limbs on the Mayflower's deck rose to his cheeks again, burning there in scarlet disks. For one instant he was silent. When he spoke there was strange sweetness in the voice that pleaded for another's happiness; no trace of the bitter strife with his own heart, from which was born this grand self sacrifice.

"Bennie, you spoke truly when you said we are old friends." He did not touch her hand now, but drew nearer the bowed form of the woman he loved, bending over her with infinite pity. "By that friendship and for the sake of another almost as old, but oh, how different, I implore you to forego this sinful purpose! Think of the sin against the old man, against him whose love you have confessed, more than all, against your own soul! Ah, Bennie, misguided child as you are, your own purity, as my judgment, must warn you that she who weds without love is no wife to the man she betrays! She is only his mistress!"

The girl recoiled, as he had struck her with the hand that touched so tenderly the golden hair in benison. But he went on steadily:

"When I said I loved you, it needed no oath to prove my truth. But the name you whispered binds me in honor to the friend who trusts me wholly and who also—loves you!"

Quickly the girl raised to his tear dimmed eyes, now full of wondering doubt. Twice her lips moved as if in speech, but no sound came from them.

"Yes, it is God's truth," the man went on, in his grand loyalty. "I told you we had a pact; the first who met you when we were free was to speak. For, with all the fervor of his southern blood, Adrien loves you, too!"

With a low, pitiful cry, Bennie held out her hands eagerly; a crimson flood swept brow and cheek. Then the face grew deadly white, the hands fell nerveless, and with bowed head she stood mute, as if for sentence.

"Hear me, Bennie!" the man pleaded. "If you spoke truly, Adrien Latour must be the husband of your heart, spite of your mockery of God's law with this old man!"

With head bowed lower, in voice like a distant moan, she answered:

"How truly I spoke God knows, who punishes me so!"

"Then I will go for Adrien!" Dale spoke in eager vibrance now, no longer doubtfully. "Months ago, when each learned the other's love, we made our compact. I have spoken, and can bear my sentence. Oh, Bennie, do not make it your own also! Let me tell Adrien I stand aside, that he may have his own!"

What changes of hope, doubt and despair filled the stricken girl's heart as Dale spoke, only the Searcher of all can know. Over her pale face swept all in succession, setting into a stony cast of the drawn features as the man turned to carry out his loyal purpose. Then with quick, imperious gesture she stopped him, speaking with hard bitterness that seemed to sting herself with every word:

"Stop, Dale Everett! What is shall be! Am I a shuttlecock to be bandied between you, left to the chance of who spoke first? You say I sell myself? But I refuse to be raffled by men who are willing that first come shall be first served! You shall not go for him!"

The little hands tightly clinched over the heaving bosom; the slim foot pressed hard upon the floor; all the light in the girl's blue eyes was of insulted pride.

"Let me go!" Dale urged. "Do not risk the ruin of three lives by your blind pride. Bennie, think, before it is too late!"

"It is too late!" she answered, hopelessly as bitterly; the hands pressed harder on her heart, but the head defiantly erect. "What is done cannot be undone save by God's will, and he

The Board of County Cammissioners of Polk County met persuant to call in the Auditor office on the 22nd day of Dec. 1890, at 10 o'clock.

Members present, Thompson, Kirsch, Johnson, and Rhinehart.

The minutes of last session were read and on motion approved.

The petition of Lou Cross was granted and the west half of section 34, Tp 154 R. 47 was attached to school distric No. 71.

Other school petitions were laid over until next meeting of the county Board.

The Auditor was instructed to advertise fo bids in the county printing for the year 1891.

The county Treasurer was authorized to procure at the expence of the county 4,500 postal cards for notifying persons of their personal taxes for the year 1890.

The bonds of County Auditor elect, C. U. Webster, was on motion approved.

The amount of boud require to be given by the County Treasueer elect John T. Beaudry was fixed at $135,000.

Andrew Eiken was required in complince with status, to give a bond in the amount of 5,000, to establish an abstract office in this county.

The sum of $11.98 was ordered efunded C. Gerlock as excess taxes paid on ne ¼ nw ¼ and s ½ nw ¼, and lots 3, 4 and 10, sec 18 Tp. 151, R. 44 for the year 1888.

The following communication of Supt. of Schools Thos Casey Esq., was read and ordered entered in the minutes of the session.

To the Honorable Board of County Commissoners:

GENTLEMEN: In assuming the duties of this office to which I was appointed by your honorable body a little over a year ago, it was my first endeavor to effect such a charge in the schools work as to be of benefit, not only to the schools in general, but to the teachers also.

As the voice of the people this fall declare that it would be for the well-being of society, the general good of the schools and also for the agricural interests of the community, that I should be removed. I must graciously accept the situation, and step down. In doing this, I submit the following.

SCHOOLS:

During the past year there has been an increase of 377 scholars entitled to apportionment while the average length of school has decreased five of a month. The number of organized school district now is 189. showing an increase of 12 school districts the past year.

Within the year twenty new school houses have been built and several of them are supplied with school libraries amounting to 207 volumes in all. The school fund has so increased that nearly one half of the money necessary to maintrin the schools is received from the state. Considerable attention has been given to planting trees on the school house grounds, there by beautifying and adorning the schools and their surroundings.

Owing to the size of the county, and the numerous labors of the office, but 135 schools have been visited. In connection with this, permit me to say that one man can not do the clerical work of the office and visit more than half of the schools while they are in session.

An effort to systemize the instruction and classify the pupils has received due attention during the past year. In view of this classification, registers and a prescribed course of study have been introduced in most of the schools. The chief object is to see that every pupil obtains the full amount of his dues in the way of instruction. In district schools are to be fount large boys within hailing distance of mauhood who complained of former years as miss-spent and wasted, and now ask to be allowed to use their few remaining school days in attempt to finish arithmetic, and to acquire a little more skill in reading and the use of the pen. "Who ever finished anything in a district school?" is a question which has gone a long time without an answer. The law of our common school system prescribes to be taught certain branches of learning. It is fair to suppose that these branches constitute a somewhat complete cource of elementry education; and are the foundation, at once, for future study and practical life. Yet a majority of the children in the district schools obtain a knowledge of only four of these eight branches, and but an imperfect knowledge at that.

If a knowledge of all the branches should be obtained it must be admitted that there is an advantage to be derived from pursuing them systematically, of the best teachers of the county concur with me in this, and say that they can discover great benefits already derived from one grading of the schools.

GRADUTION FROM DISTRICT SCHOOL.

The benefits of a graduation from the district school are many and important, among which ar: it is an incentive to study. It secures a better attendance; it keeps pupils in school longer; it creates a more general interest in the public at large in our schools; and last, but not least, it helps to unify the schools of the county.

TEACHERS:

The schools are being supplied with better teachers. Progress is becoming more general. Old ideas are being superseded, and the new and well attested adopted. The true idea of education is more generally comprehended by our teachers. For improved methods and a higher inspiration we are indepted to our normal school and high school.

Most of our school officers are becoming more particular than formerly in the selection of teachers. Many districts have applied to me and employed such teachers as are recommended. As one result, many persons who have been teaching, are now attending school, with the view to better preparation for their work.

There is an opportunity and a promise of a much needed reform in school organization, the more important duties which have been increasingly committed to superintendents, directly or indirectly are the directly and improvement of school instruction and discipline; and to this end the training and stimulation of principals and teachers, the arranging and perfection of courses of study, the selection of text books and teachers appliances, the promotion and classification of pupils and last, but not least, the selection and assignment of teachers.

In conclusion, I desire to thank you, gentelmen, for appointing me as your choice from among the teachers of the county, and for the courtesy you have shown me while I have been with you; and lastly, I express the most sincere gratitude for the aid and many kind suggestions given me by our most esteemed County Auditor.

THOS. CASEY,
County Superintendent of of Schools

The Auditor was directed to enter in the 1890 tax books all amounts of seed grain levied on personal property for 1889 and now remaining uncollected where no judgment has been entered.

Chas. E. Sawyer was ordered refunded $4.80 as a duplicate payment of taxes paid in part of lots 4 & 2 blank 12, Fletchers& Houstons Addition.

The Board had under consideration the recommedation of the grand jury, that the books, records and accounts in the various country offices of the county be examined by two expert accountants from the organization of the county down to the present time, and in relation thereto make the following statements to the tax payers of county, as to the manner in which the business of the county is conducted.

First: As to the receipts of the county: All monies are paid to the Treasurer of the county who issues a receipt therefor too person paying the same. Duplicate receipts are duly filled with the County Auditor, who charges the Treasurer with the amount. All recepts are consecutively numbered and the duplicate stub of each is carefully preserved in bond from and kept on file.

These stub receipts as also the stubs of all orders drawn on the County Treasurer had been carefully examined from time to time, public examiner of this state and have been found correctly accounted for. The last examination by said examiner was made on the 11th to 15th days of October last, a copy of which is here to attached.

Second, as to payments by treasurer.

All monies are paid out on the order of the chairman of the board of county commissioners, attested by the county auditor, for claims duly allowed by the draod of county commissioners, at either a regular or special session of the board, except where the amount is fixed by some court or tribunal, as in the case of distric court exphose, which are paed on the certificate of the clerk of said court to the juror or other attendant on said, court, or in cases of insane expenses, where the Judge of Probate issues his certificate.

Itemized statements of each and every payment have been made out in the month of January each year, and such statements have been qublised in the official papers of the county at the time. At the time of making this annual statements each year, the board of county commissioners has carefully compared all voucherswith the original stuq of same in the auditor's office, and have found the same to be correct in every case.

At the time of settelmant with the county treasurer in March. June and Nov, ember in each year, duplidates of all tax receipts ussued since the last settlement are compared with the amount of tax, as shown on the tax books of the townships, and a record of each settelment duly duly made by the auditor, and this board takes pleasure in bering tetimony to the exemplary manner in which the books of the auditor's and treasuser's office are kept, and from our knowledge of the management of these two offices, consider them first among the mocel offices of the state of Minnesota. So much for the offics of the state of county auditor and treasurer.

In relation to the office of register of deeds the officer is entitled to and receives all the fees coming unto his hands, as the special law making it a salaried office was repealed.

As to the office os Clurk of district court the salary is fixed at $1800 per annum and all fees received by that officer over and above said amount, are paid into the county treasury in accordance with his annual statement of fees received. The salary of the deputy clark ($1000 per annum) is paid by the county.

As to the office of the probate judge, the fees receved by that officer are turned into the county treasurer quarterly in accordance with the general laws of 1889.

The office of sheriff, attorney and superintendent of schools, are not directly connected with the county financiering and may be passed over at this time.

The board has written to the public examiner of this state as to the necessity of employing experts to examine the books and records of this county from its organization up to date, and have received a reply thereto, which is hereto attached, and which explains itself. The state examiner has been unable to meet with this board at the present session, but will meet our board on the 6th day January next, and if any person has any charge to make against any officer of the county, or has any grievance against any officer of this county, or has any grievance against any officer of this county, let him present his complaint in writing to this board, and the same shall be thoroughly investigated by this board, and the public examiner or other competent accountant, but the idea of incurring several thousand dollars expenses on vague rumors we deem it to be wholly unwarranted.

The board desires at this time to place before the people of this county the following facts in conection with the present administration of Polk county:

When this board assumed its duties in January 1887, the rate of taxation for county purposes was 9.06 mills, there was over $20,000 of floating orders. Since then we have reduced the rate of taxation each year until it is now 6.02 for all county purposes.

In January, 1887, our county orders were selling at a discount of 5rom to to 15 per cent. To-day our ordeas are at par, not a dollar of the orders of the county outstanding, there being ample funds in the general revenue fund of the county to meet all demands, and besides this we have been enabled to authorize the redemption of $13,000 os our county bonds, and our bonded indebtedness will be reduced in that amount in the present month, leaving the total indebtedness at $100,000 in round figures.

We further desire to remind the tax payers of this county that this board has, during the past four years, expended over $21,000 on roads and bridges in the several townships of this county and yet while increasing this very commendable and benificial expenditure, we at the same time materially reduced the rate of taxation.

We consider the foregoing a highly proper and creditable showing to make to the citizens and taxpayers of this large and prosperous county, and feel confident that our record will compare favarably with that of any former board in this county, and with that of any county board in this state. The financial standing of Polk county and its management is strictly first-class, and is equaled by few counties in the state at the present time.

REPORT OF PUBLIC EXAMINER.

SINGLE TAX DEPARTMENT.

RELIEVE THE FARMER.

Under the George system, the government will no more own and control land and "rent it out to the highest bidder" than it does now. Land, under his system will continue to be owned by individuals precisely as it is now. It will descend to heirs and be devised to legatees precisely as it is now. Not a single law relative to land ownership and control now upon our statute books will be changed in carrying out his doctrines to the fullest extent. A man's right, under the present system, to enjoy the exclusive possession of a tract of land is conditioned upon the payment of a tax upon its value. And so it will be under the George system, without the slightest change in the machinery now in use for the assessment and collection of taxes on real estate.

Henry George simply proposes to reform our present absurd and barbarous system of levying taxes, a system which discourages enterprise and thrift and encourages monopoly and greed.

Take the case of a young man here in Texas, who, we will say, by working on shares, has finally saved up a little capital, and who now proposes to become the owner of a farm of his own. He is going to get a piece of wild land, break it up, grub it, fence it and cultivate it. He has a wagon, a pair of horses, a few household utensils, a wife, plenty of children and a little money. He does not dream of getting rich; he merely hopes to secure a competency by faithful work. He looks around for a location. He naturally desires to settle near town, where he will be handy to market, and where his family can enjoy the society of neighbors and the benefits of church and school privileges. He finds just such a town. He finds tens of thousands of acres of vacant land all around this town and close to it. Just the kind of land he is looking for. No one is using it, and it lies there idle, waiting for the hand of industry to be applied to it. But he finds that the speculators have got there ahead of him. They are keeping it for an increase in value. In order to get hold of a hundred acre tract of this land he must mortgage himself to some speculator. He must bind himself to pay over to a speculator all that he can possibly save in excess of the barest possibilities of life for a term of years. He feels that the land is already above his means, so he turns away, drives out twenty miles and buys a hundred acres out of a thousand acre tract held by another speculator, for which he pays $200, and then settles down in the wilderness.

His children can scarcely get to school at all. It is miles to any church. He has to haul his cotton five miles to the nearest gin. He wastes a great deal of time on the poor roads between his home and the town where he does his marketing, hauling his produce over thousands and tens of thousands of acres of land just as well adapted to raising it as that which he has been compelled to select so far away. He works to far greater disadvantage than he would had he been permitted to settle nearer town, hence he produces less, and therefore must buy less.

Now, why have the speculators seized this vacant land and taken it out of the reach of this industrious farmer? Do they propose to use it? Do they propose to do any thing with it by which labor can be employed, and the sum total of the world's wealth increased? Do they propose to invest a dollar in the cultivation and improvement of this land? By no means. They propose that some one else shall do the work and have the worry, and take the chances of the crops failing. Yet they propose, nevertheless, to get rich out of this land. How? By holding it in idleness, by driving labor off from it, and compelling labor to pass it by and settle on far less eligible and desirable tracts. One of these speculators paid $1,000 for a piece of this land. It is now worth $5,000. Whose labor has put an additional value of $4,000 upon this piece of vacant land? Not the labor of the present owner, nor the labor of any previous owner, because no one has ever done a stroke of work upon the land. It has resulted from the increase of population. It has been put there by the community. The speculator sells the tract for $5,000 and thus makes $4,000. He has not, however, increased the sum total of the world's wealth one iota by the transaction. He has simply drawn to himself $4,000 worth of wealth which other people have produced—wealth which labor has been compelled to pay over to him for the bare privilege of access to one of the gifts of nature.

Well, our young farmer, after a year's hard work in fencing, breaking the sod, and putting up buildings, has added $300 worth of improvement to that hundred acre tract of land. By the sweat of his brow he has actually increased the sum total of the wealth of the world to the extent of $300. What happens now? Why, the tax-collector comes around and fines him for it by taxing these improvements. He has to yield up to the government in taxes on these improvements a portion of the fruits of his individual industry. He is robbed on account of taxes on these improvements of a portion of the values produced solely by his individual industry. The community did not put this additional value of $300 upon his land. He put it there by his own hard work. But who is putting values yearly on the vacant land adjoining, which the speculator is holding in idleness? Is it not the community that does it? Now, why should our young farmer be taxed any more for using his hundred-acre tract of land and giving employment to labor on it than the speculator is taxed for holding in idleness a tract of equal value and preventing labor from using it? Which act conduces most to the prosperity of the country? Why should not the speculator pay at least as much tax for the privilege of excluding labor from a hundred-acre tract of land as the farmer has to pay for the privilege of employing labor on a tract of equal value?

Under the present taxing system our young farmer must pay the government say 1 per cent. taxes on his land and improvements, amounting to $1 a year for the privilege of the exclusive possession of his hundred-acre farm. If he doesn't pay it his farm will be sold for taxes. The speculator from whom he bought, however, only pays $1 a year tax on the adjoining hundred acres of equally as valuable land. Has the farmer hurt any one by improving his hundred acre tract? If not, why should he be fined for it? On the contrary, by settling on one hundred acres of that thousand acre tract he has made the nine hundred acres more valuable, and when other hard working farmers settle in the neighborhood, they, by their labor, by their common energy and enterprise, will add yearly to the value of the speculator's holdings. But will they get any advantage from this enhancement in the value of his land, which they themselves have caused? Will he give them any portion of this unearned increment which they themselves have produced? On the contrary, should one of these farmers desire to increase the size of his farm, or to settle one of his children on adjoining land, he will have to pay the speculator for the very enhancement in the value of the land which has resulted from the application of his own labor upon his own land.

The first step in carrying out the George doctrine in Texas is simply exempting by law all personal property and improvement on land from taxation, and requiring taxes to be levied on land values alone. Such a law would be a direct benefit to every farmer in the State.

Here in Harris County, at least six-sevenths of the land is wholly unimproved, and probably one-third of the lots within the corporate limits of the city of Houston are vacant. On an average all over the United States about one-half of the taxable values of a community are in personal property and improvements on land, while the other half is in the land itself.

In Harris County we must raise say $200,000 a year to cover State, county and municipal taxation. Now, in order to raise the sum on one-half the taxable values in the county, as would probably be necessary were we to exempt personal property and improvements on the land from taxation, we should of course be compelled to double the tax on land values. This would double the tax now paid on any tract of vacant land. It would, however, reduce the taxes on farms and residences from fifty to five hundred per cent. A hundred acre farm in Harris County, the assessed valuation of which is $1,000, pays a tax of $10 a year. Now, what is the assessed valuation of wild land in the neighborhood similar in quality to such a tract, and which is likely enough owned by a non-resident speculator? Is it more than a dollar an acre? Is it more than one-tenth the assessed valuation of the improved farm? To the owner of such an improved farm I say, if the first step even in carrying out the George doctrine were adopted, the assessment of the speculator's land would be doubled, but your farm would be assessed at precisely the same valuation as his land adjoining of equal value with your own, regardless of the improvements. You would thus be assessed at $200 instead of $1,000, and your taxes would be $2 a year instead of $10, a reduction of taxation in your case of five hundred per cent. Yet people say that the farmers will never be such fools as to adopt the George theory. Time alone will show.

Henry George teaches that the more farms that are opened up and improved the more machinery, buildings and factories are erected, the more coal beds and mineral deposits are developed, the more residences are built, the more will labor be in demand and the better wages will the laborer get. The more wages the laborers get the more will they have to spend, the more will they buy and the better will times be all around. Why, then, should the man who improves land, who builds a residence, a storehouse, a factory or a tenement on land be fined by a tax gatherer on account of his enterprise and his willingness to do some thing with his money which gives employment to labor? If any one is to be fined, why should it not be the man who, instead of putting his money into productive enterprises, attempts to forestall labor by buying up the vacant lands, the undeveloped coal bed and mineral deposit, with the purpose of extorting blackmail from labor, a bounty for the bare privilege of making nature useful to mankind?

By taxing improvements, buildings, tenement houses and factories, we discourage the investment of capital in productive enterprises which give employment to labor. By taxing land values alone, by increasing the burden of taxation on land values, we do not lessen the amount of land, but we cheapen its price, we make the speculator who is holding it in idleness a little more anxious to sell, we make the land owner a little more anxious to improve. A tax on land values alone, therefore, instead of retarding enterprise, stimulates enterprise.

Now, suppose this first step had been taken when our young farmer went forth seeking land for his own farm. If it had cost speculators twice as much in taxes to hold vacant land around that town would they have been as eager to buy it up in the first place? Would they not have been a little more shy about investing in it, and hence would not its price have been considerably less? and hence could not our farmer have got just as good a piece of land for the same price a good deal nearer town? and hence would not his family have had more social advantages and better church and school privileges? and would he not have saved a good deal of time in going to mill and market, and would he not have worked to better advantage in a great many ways, and therefore have produced more and hence have been able to buy more? and if his merchant were relieved from the payment of taxes on his store house and stock of goods, would not this lessen the cost of his doing business, and hence lessen the selling price of his goods, also to the farmer's advantage. A Scheming Wife.

"Waal, John, before you marry I'd advise you to be sure your wife ain't a schemer."

"What do you mean, Uncle Josh? What would my intended wife scheme for? Not my wealth, surely."

"Oh, that ain't what I mean. I—I mean schemin' like your Aunt Sally."

Uncle Josh heaved a deep sigh and glanced furtively at the door, as if in fear of being overheard.

"Now, Uncle Josh, you do not mean to say marriage has been a failure for you, do you?" said John mischievously.

"Sh! not so loud. I would not have Sally think I was any ways ungrateful for her efforts, and she surely makes enough of 'em, but I am awful tired of her schemes. First, she must keep bees, I did not want 'em but she schemed till she got 'em. After she had 'em I tried to show her a little about managing them, but I had not seen a bee since I was a boy, and I was unable to go into society a month after the event.

"But you still keep bees, I see."

"Yass, and your Aunt Sally takes care of em. I never go next or nigh 'em," says Uncle Josh, emphatically.

"Waal, next she takes to poultry. She near breaks me up buying fancy breeds; but I did not mind that so much as the incubator. Some cuss—Mr. Edison, I think—invented that machine, and it's calculated to rob a hen of all the joys of maternity."

"Did the incubator cause you much discomfort, Uncle Josh?"

"Did it? Sometimes of a winter night, that woman would be out of bed as high as six times tendin' her blamed chicken machine."

"I thought you slept so soundly you would not mind that," said John.

"I was generally unconscious when she got out of bed, but ugh! I can yet feel her feet when she came back."

"Was her venture successful?"

"In a measure, my boy, in a measure. I got spinal mena—spinal something, I forget what, caused by sudden chills. What was that noise, John?' whispered Uncle Josh, nervously.

"A cat, I think," replied John.

"Do you notice how my clothes fit?" continued Uncle Josh.

"I don't see anything particularly wrong with them."

"But they feel, John, and I don't dare say a word about them, not if my shirts choke me. Sometimes my pants just reach my boot tops, then ag'in they trail in the dust."

"Fashions change, maybe," said John. "But why do you hesitate to tell Aunt Sally how you like them?"

"That woman got up the durndest scheme and took the whole family into it. What was that? I'm sure I heard some one."

"Rest easy, Uncle Josh, and tell me of this infamous scheme.

"Waal, that woman came to me one day smilin' as a basket of chips, and says she, 'Josh, I sold some chickens and bought you a splendid suit of clothes and shirts to go with them,' and she unfolds the duds. Them shirts was all glistening and the clothes plentifully decorated with store tags, and I was that innocent I took it as a matter of course. They fit me beautifully, and I ain't had any to fit me since. After I had worn them a month and frequently explained to the women folks wherein store clothes were superior to home made, they holds a mass meeting and tells me how Sally made them clothes herself, and Simpkins down to the store furnished the tag decorations while the steam laundry aided her in the deceit about the shirts. Sally had made a confident of all the neighbor women and the hired man. Almost everybody knew I was bein' hum-bugged. Do you know what her latest scheme is, John?"

"No; what is it, Uncle?"

"Writing for the press and making me an object of ridicule before the world."

"How should that make you an object of ridicule, Uncle Josh?"

"You see for each article she writes she takes one of my little peculiarities for her subject, and although she never mentions my name, yet I am readily recognized about here. Now, if Sally was a loving wife she would not do that. She says if I keep showing new phases of character, she won't have time to make my clothes as she will be so busy writing me up."

An audible snicker interrupted Uncle Josh's tale.

"Another scheme of Sally's," said he as he slid through the window and disappeared in the direction of the barn in time to evade Sally and the girls who had been lending a sympathetic ear through the key-hole.

Red Is the Danger Color.

"Has it ever struck you," said a Pittsburgher, who paints not signs but pictures, "that red is a dangerous color, that it stands for danger in all sorts of ways? On the railroads, of course you know, red is the danger signal in flags by day, in lamps by night. Everybody is accustomed to the idea of red as a warning on the railroads, and at sea the red lights serves the same purpose. Then red stands for anarchy. The Anarchists are often called the Reds, and the flag which has waved over some of the bloodiest scenes in the world's history is a sanguinary red. To wave a red flag before a bull is about as dangerous a thing as you can do. The uniform of the fireman has been red since time immemorial, although since organized fire departments have been organized the color has been sensibly changed, for the element the firemen fight is red, and the danger is apparent. The hue of the poppy in the fields suggests the dangerous side of the narcotic it harbors. Some one aware of the dangers of debauches has coined the phrase we know so well, 'Painting the 'town red.' Red in art is a risky color to use unless the painter knows thoroughly how to use it, as Sir Edwin Landseer did in his pictures, which invariably contained a touch of red somewhere. Turner employed red lavishly, and although he suceeded in producing marvelous effects, his followers have made countless millions mourn over fiery corusations on canvas. Wherever you turn you find red as a mark of peril."

"In literature is it so?"

"Yes, even in literature, for are not bad books most harmful when they are read?—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

Dr. Koch's Assistant.

The secret of Dr. Koch's remedy is now out. It is consumption all the way through. By consuming guinea the consumption that consume the pigs he obtains a lymph able to consume consumptive—a new proof, if any were needed, that the guinea pig is one of the best freinds that the therapeutics ever had. This particular pig seems to have been made for the express purpose of being experimented upon, and has laid down its little life on the altar of investigation with a regularity that reaches the sublime. It has been resected and bisected and dissected and vivisected; it has been stuffed to death and starved to death; it has been fed on all sorts of things, from caramels to prussic acid, and then, again, it has been left to die of inanation, with a thermometer applied to its wasting form every half hour till it expired. All this it has done and suffered for the good of man, and it there be such a thing as a four-footed martyr this much-tortured creature deserves the crown. As the last of many benefactions it permits itself to be distilled into an anti-tuberculosis lymph, and as the lymph is in all probability reproductive, like the vaccine virus, it looks as if the time had arrived to let up on our little friend. He has done much for humanity, and humanity in turn should give him a rest and let the Australian rabbit or English sparrow take an inning

Science Befogged.

Concerning those who, although able are unwilling to take the trouble to write for their readers or speak for their hearers, a somewhat more extended comment may be desirable. It is always difficult to make a just analysis of motives, but there can be little doubt that some of these are influenced by a desire to imitate the rare genius whose intellectual advances are so rapid and so powerful as to forbid all efforts to secure a clear and simple presentation of results. The king is lame and the courtier must limp. With others there is a strange and unwholesome prejudice against making science intelligible, for fear that science may become popular. It is forgotten that clear and accurate expression, and that as a matter of fact the two are almost inseparable.

The apparent success before the people of the dilettante and the charlatan has resulted, in the case of many good and able men, in a positive aversion to popular approval. It should never be forgotten that the judgment and taste of the public in matters relating to science are just as susceptible of cultivation as in music and the fine arts, and that scientific men owe it to themselves to see that opportunity for this culture is not withheld.—Professor T. C. Mendenhall in Popular Science.

'Twas a Cruel Trick.

"It is a cruel mistake, my dear nephew this thinking it necessary for a young fellow to take intoxicants in order to be merry," said a fond uncle to a young fellow, as they were walking up Park Row. The old man had come in from his farm to see the city. "Well let's take a a soda water, Unk, and I'll swear off," replied the young man, as they turned into a drug store.

The nephew gave the order "Here's to the drink of the moral, the sober and industrious; it imparts coolness to the blood, sensibility to the palate and calmness to the mind; it invigorates without depressing and sustains without exhausting," exclaimed the elder man, waxing eloquent. "It's a go; drink hearty, Unk," said the young man, as he winked at the clerk, and they emptied their glasses. Ten minutes later "Unk" was seen trying with difficulty to scull himself around a lamp post with an umbrella. "Unk" thinks city soda water has gained potency since he was young.—From the New York Tribune.

BABY.

A little form, so dainty small,
So soft, so tender and so dear;
A little voice, whose helpless call
Is music to a mother's ear;
A little pulse of delicate breath,
Like Eve's when zephyr whispereth;

A little arm, that nerveless lies;
Red, curling fingers, tiniest things;
Two round, blue, upward-gazing eyes,
All filled with silent wonderings,
That, as the kiss of Heaven's light bids,
Now ope, now close their downy lids;

A little head, so smooth and white,
Pert, rosy mouth and fairy chin,
And cheeks all rounded to the sight,
Save where a dimple draws them in;
All in one tiny frame enwove,
As light as laughter, soft as love.

A Ride on the Prairie.

"Speaking of riding," said the colonel, as reported in the New York Tribune, "there is only one horse in the world that can carry 160 pounds on his back all day at a clipping gait, and that's a mustang. A mustang would rather run than eat oats. You can't kill one of them, and, as for tiring him, it's no use to try. I remember a little ride which I made once in Colorado. I had been in charge of the old man's cattle camp, and got one of those insane notions into my head that I wanted to go to Denver. I made up an excuse that the old man had sent for me to come to Denver to see about driving in a thousand head. and slipping into my saddle, turned my mustang's head toward the railroad ninety miles away, and let the little rat make his own pace. When I reached the railroad I put up my mustang and boarded the first train for Denver.

"I hadn't been in the town thirty minutes before I met Sam Wilson, who always staid in Denver with the old man."

"'Hullo! What are you doing here?' he said.

"'The old man sent for me.' I answered promptly.

"'The deuce he did.' said Sam, with a twinkle in his eye. 'He took the 10 o'clock train this morning, bound for the ranch.'

"'See here, Sam,' I said, making a breast of it, 'don't say anything about this, and it will be a fine dinner for you when he does send for me. I can get a train in two hours that will give him only five hours the start of me, and with hard riding I can beat him into the ranch, taking the upper trail,'

"'Go it, my boy,' answered Sam, 'and my blessings be with you.'

"When I stepped off the train the night was like pitch, and a hard sleet was driving across the prairie. I was in my saddle within ten minutes, and shaking out the reins touched my mustang's flanks with my spurs. He shot away like an arrow, and then settling down close to the ground dug along beautifuly. The sleet stung like pin darts, but my mustang climbed along in the darkness without a word or a touch of the spur from me. Only once he showed any fight, and that was when I turned him into the upper trail. There was a climb here, and the going was bad, and the mustang seemed to think I was crazy to take the trail. After I got him into it, however, he slipped away and went scurrying along like a nimble rabbit.

"Along the trail we went, I talking to the mustang all the time. At times the sleet burned my face and hands and neck and ears so that I pulled down the mustang and let my face lie against his warm, dripping neck under his heavy mane. Then we were off again on another race.

"I don't know how long we were on that ride, for I took no time at either end of it. But when I reached camp there were no lights burning, and I knew that I had beaten the old man.

"'See here, boys,' I said, stalking inside and wringing the wet from my beard, 'the old man is coming, and you needn't say anything about my going to Denver.' I heard a chuckle under the blankets. They understood me in a minute, and were laughing at my ride,

I'll sit up for him,' I said. He ought to be along in an hour, anyway, and it is almost daylight now. Another chuckle, and then peaceful snoring.

"When did the old man reach camp? He didn't come. It was a trick played on meby that Sam Wilson."

A Memorial to an Astronomer.

Mrs. Richard A. Proctor, widow of the eminent astronomer, is engaged in a work destined as a memorial to her husband, which will make her name famous through all the ages to come, says an exchange. She proposes to build an observatory on Mission Heights, San Diego, Cal. On a great bluff, from which a most beautiful view of the Pacific is attainable from one side and the other side overlooking the San Diego River and the fertile San Diego Valley, it has been decided to place the building. This location will be far superior to that of Lick Observatory, for the reason that it is below the frost line and can be visited with comfort at all seasons of the year, while the Lick institution is cut off from the outside world by snow sometimes for weeks. The Proctor Observatory is to be open to visitors every day in the year between the hours of 8 and 10 o'clock P. M., while Lick is open to the public but one evening in the week.

Mrs. Proctor will go to England on a lecturing tour, and will deliver a number of lectures for the benefit of the observatory. The site for the observatory has been donated, and in addition to this 200 town lots and about $6,000 in cash. A telescope will be ordered, and it is probable that Mrs. Proctor may secure the telescope exhibited by the Clarks, which attracted so much attention at the Paris Exposition. The buildings will cost $10,000, the telescope $15,000, and the observatory will be sustained by an endowment fund. During the lifetime of Professor Proctor his wife was one of his most earnest and careful students, and was his constant companion in his researches.

New Ways of Opening Bottles.

The other night, while sitting with some friends in the club-house, I noticed a young man at a table near us, apparently tired of waiting for the waiter, strike the neck of a wine bottle a sharp, quick stroke with his knife in such a manner that the bottle was broken squarely off just below the cork as neatly and cleanly as if it had been cut off with a diamond.

"That was very well done," remarked one of my friends, "but did you ever see a method some sailors have for opening a bottle of wine? Several years ago, when the Grand Duke Alexis of Russia was here in command of a small fleet, I was invited over to visit the flagship—the Svetland—by one of the officers with whom I had become acquainted. While we were on the ship our host sent for some wine, and, learning that we had never witnessed the sailor's method of opening it, he called three lusty fellows into the cabin to perform the operation. One man held the ends of the bottle in his hands, while the second wound a piece of stout twine around it, and pulled the ends violently and swiftly backward and forward, thus heating the glass by the friction. The third man then dashed some cold water upon the bottle and the glass cracked with a snap. The man who held the two ends lifted them so quickly and dexterously that scarcely a drop was spilled. The bottle was converted, practically, into two glasses—one not unlike an ordinary tumbler, and the other having the cork in the bottom of it."—From the New York Star.

SIR PHILLIP MILLER, the great English horticulturist, writing in 1740, says: "The best method to have cabbages good is to procure fresh seed from abroad every year, for it is apt to degenerate in England in few years."
The above is a simple illustration of the fact that the best seeds will rapidly degenerate under unfavorable conditions. The wise will take heed, therefore, and buy their seeds of D. M. Ferry & Co., Detroit, Michigan, whose world wide reputation as the best and most reliable, as well as the most extensive seed growers and dealers, is due to the fact that they take advantage of every circumstance of climate, soil, methods of culture, selection of seed-plants, etc., to procure the best possible seeds and keep them up to that high standard.

AN ICY INVASON
Of the back and shoulders announces the approach of chills and fever. You go to bed, if lucky enough to sleep, you awake in a furnace, or fancy so. Fierce is the heat that consumes you. Then comes profuse sweating. This over you resemble a limp, damp rag. After the first paroxysm, prevent another with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which knocks out malaria, biliousness, constipation and kidney complaints.

GOOD COUNTRY TO LIVE IN.

The German emperor and I
  Within the self-same year were born,
Beneath the self-same sky,
  Upon the self-same morn;
A kaisor he, of high estate,
And I the usual chance of fate.

His father was a prince, and mine—
  Why, just a farmer—that is all.
Stars still are stars although some shine
  And some roll hid in midnight's pall;
But argue, cavil all you can,
My sire was just as good a man.

The German Emperor and I
  Eat, drink and sleep the self-same way,
For bread is bread and pie is pie,
  And kings can eat but thrice a day,
And sleep will only come to those Whose mouths and stomachs are not foes.

I rise at six and go to work,
  And he at five, and does the same,
We both have cares we cannot shirk;
  Mine are for loved ones; his for fame.
He may live best, I cannot tell;
I'm sure I wish the kaiser well.

I have a wife, and so has he;
  And yet, if pictures do not err,
As far as human sight can see,
  Mine is by long odds twice as fair.
Say, would I trade those eyes dark brown?
Not for an empress and her crown.

And so the emperor and I
  On this one point could ne'er agree;
Moreover, we will never try,
  His frau suits him and mine suits me,
And though his sons one day may rule,
Mine stand A1 in public school.

So let the kaiser have his sway,
  Bid kings and nations tumble down,
I have my freedom and my say.
  And fear no ruler and his crown;
For I, unknown to fame and war,
Live where each man is emperor.

THE SCAPEGRACE.

We who earn our living by hard work naturally regard with a good deal of interest those who manage to dodge this seeming necessity.

What are these mysterious mortals, we say, who toil not, neither do they steal, who have no property, nor any apparent source of income, yet they wear clothes, eat meals, and sleep under a good roof like the rest of us?

We have a habit of speaking with contempt of these people, as though they were beneath us in the social scale. Are we not really in secret a little envious of their originality and courage?

If one should, for example, try the simple rule of "put yourself in his place——"

You, now, who make a living by some occupation, commonplace but reliable, suppose you were to wake tomorrow in a strange place. without money or friends, and with all work prohibited—what would you do? How would you arrange about breakfast, and, subsequently, about dinner, and supper, and a bed, and then numerous meals and beds thereafter? Would you not be frightened? Would you not be at a loss what to do? Well, that is where you would show your inferiority to those of whom we speak.

It must be admitted that they could, if they wished, earn a plain, honest living as we do; whereas could we, by the exercise of all our wits, exist a week after their fashion? En effet, there you have the whole matter.

Before I undertook a study of these singular beings, I always thought of them as a class by themselves, pursuing, for the most part, similar methods. To live without work constituted in my mind a profession—like law or the ministry. I wronged them. I did not appreciate their fecund originality. There is no profession that is common to them all. but each has his own, complete in itself, unique and delicate as the miniature carved-work of the Japanese.

To tell of them is to tell of individuals, not of the class.

There was one who recently came to live at the very respectable boarding-place of the present writer. He was, as the naturalists would say, an excellent specimen—rather young, good-looking, well-dressed, and correctly mannered. There are some of this class who have a low habit of making a pretence of earning a living. They will maintain an office with "Real Estate," or "Commission," or something of that kind, on the door. To no such stupid vulgarity did Mr. Richard Kerth descend. Not even a suggestion of work cast a cloud upon his title of "gentleman."

I had known something of the previous career of Mr. Kerth, and when he took possession of two of the best rooms in the house I hastened to make his acquaintance. He treated me with easy condescension, and soon offered to borrow money of me.

I did not loan Mr. Kerth any money. It was indeed, for a long time, a source of quiet satisfaction to me that while a number of others in plain view on all sides, were being taxed for the support of this American peer, I was exempt. But one day, when I was being measured for an overcoat, my tailor asked me what I knew about Mr. Richard Kerth, and told me that he owed fifty dollars on a suit of clothes. I answered Shearsby that I thought he had better charge it up to profit and loss. He immediately proceeded to do so. The overcoat which I ordered was more expensive by five dollars than I had expected, and possibly about nine other of Shearsby's customers suffered a similiar amount of indirect taxation.

As time passed, I gained more and more of Mr. Kerth's confidence. I knew just enough about his past performances to make him think that my silence was a useful commodity, and he sought to purchase it with frankness. He was, however, loth to betray his secret all at once, but prepared me beforehand by various significant hints to appreciate better its mysterious nature.

One evening, when he was smoking one of my cigars before my fire, he said: "I am getting very hard up; I must raise some money."

I said: "How will you do it?"

"I have a method of my own," he answered, "which I apply whenever I am in need of ready cash."

"What is it like?"

He smiled with the smile of a sphinx, as he replied:

"I call it a system of absence."

On several occasions he made use of phraseology similar to the above. For example, once he said to me: "I get a good enough living out of not being in certain places at certain times." Further he would not explain.

About this time his creditors, of whom the crop seemed to be perennial, began to press him close, and it was evident that, unless the ready cash should presently come to his rescue, he was lost—that is, lost in the same way that he had been lost many times before. In the nick of time the money came, however, and he proceeded, with the skill of a practical debtor, to make a small stream of cash irrigate a vast area of credit. This being accomplished, he was at ease again; and one night, over a bottle of wine and cigars, he told me how he had raised the money.

"It wasn't much," he said carelessly— "five or six hundred. I manage to raise that sum about four times a year. If you understand how to make it go—good as twice that, you know. Now, I'll tell you. I have, back east, a number of relatives—rich, respected, and all that. Money comes from them. Easy enough, you think? Well, I wonder. I am the black sheep of the outfit—scapegrace, you know. And do you imagine, they would ever give up a bean for me, if I did not come at 'em with something worse than a gun? Why sir, the whole bloody layout is os mean, and they hate me so, that, I give you my word, if I was roasting in the lowest depths of Sheol, there isn't one of 'em would loan you a fork to go and see if I was done. No, sir! That's the kind of citizens they are. But I notice they come up pretty regular just the same."

He flicked the ashes from his high-priced cigar into the fireplace with an impressive gesture. Then from his desk he produced several letters and a large book labeled "Journal."

"Here it is," he exclaimed, throwing the book down on the table in front of me; "'Richard Kerth's Ready Letter-Writer, or the Art of Holding up Your Relations.' And here are sample returns," he added, dropping the letters on the table. But you had better begin at my end of the transaction. Read the in book first—the last batch of letters copied there. I always copy 'em so as to keep track of what I'm doing."

I opened the volume at the place which he indicated, and began to read aloud: "Hiram Griffin, Cleveland, Ohio: My Dear Uncle——'"

"My mother's only brother," interpolated the scapegrace—"Presbyterian elder—hardware merchant—moral citizen."

I read on: "'I suppose you will be devilish glad to learn that I have at last decided to turn my face homeward, I am tired of wandering, and it's d——d poor picking out here. I expect to start in a couple of weeks unless I hear from you in the meantime. A lot of California stock will be entered at the fall meeting at Cleveland, and I think I can fix for both of us to get let in on the ground floor, so that we can make a good thing out of it. How are Bill and Jimmy?——'"

"William and James," said the black sheep, rolling up his eyes; "his sons, whom he is bringing up in the way they should go—pious youths of sixteen or thereabouts."

"'I expect they would enjoy the races and some of life that I could show them. I plan to spend a month in Cleveland, and perhaps may locate there. Some of the fellows are making up a party to go to Chinna. If I had a couple of hundred more I would go with them, but I have only just enough to take me home. Your affectionate nephew—Richard.'"

"Cold chills ran down his back when he read that letter," said Mr. Kerth. "Here is his reply. He prays for the salvation of my soul, and incloses a check for two hundred. See? Read the next one."

It was addressed to "S. Von Doosan Kerth, The Baeuchamp, New-York City," and began: "Dear Uncle."

"Father's brother," the scapegrace explained; "batchelor—great swell. He never saw me, and has an idea I am very wild and woolly, like everything west of Croton Aqueduct."

I read as follows: "'Dear Uncle—Respected brother of my parent; I take my pen in hand to let you know that two weeks from date I shall take the train for your city, and shall visit you at the Beauchamp House, where you are staying. If you should happen to be out of town, I will wait until you come back, for I mean to live in your city hereafter; I hope to get a job there. I know you will help me, as your brother's son to get a job. Perhaps Mr. Beauchamp would like a man to carry trunks. I know you will be glad to see me. If I could get into the grocery business here I would stay, and a man I know of will take me in for two hundred dollars. Please look for me at the depot in the emigrant-cars. Your nephew, Richard.'"

"Imagine Uncle Van Doosan reading that epistle at his club," said the scapegrace; "I wonder it didn't give him a stroke of apoplexy. However, it was not the first of its kind. He always comes up. I don't have to whistle twice to him."

The next was addressed to "Mrs. Elizabeth Pennington, Germantown, Philadelphia.

"Van Doosan's sister," said the scapegrace; "they have quarrled and won't compare notes. She is a widow, with a fine income and an elegant place. Two lovely marriageable daughters."

The letter set forth the intended visit of Mr. Richard Kerth to the east and his plan to spend some time at Germantown—at his aunt's residence, if she wished it so if not, with some friends of his there by the name of Boggs. There were various gallant references to Mr. Kerth's cousins and a delicate sinuation that he would probably fall in love with one of them during his visit, There was also a casual reference to the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars.

"She was short this time," remarked the writer of the letter aloud; "only sent a hundred. Strike her deeper next time."

There were two more letters in the batch—both to cousins living in Chicago. They were full of mysterious hints about good times to be enjoyed when he should visit the city shortly. Each demanded a plain loan of fifty dollars.

"I send them to their houses," said he, with a villianous grin; "their wifes read 'em first. Good for fifty any time.

I noticed that the book was written nearly full, and that Mr. Kerth's "visiting—list—" if so it might be called—contained some ten or fifteen names. Each letter was dated, and underneath was entered the result achieved. The latter was generally favorable.

"Whenever the machinery gets rusty," said the scapegrace, "which happens every four or five years, I take a trip east and lubricate things. After that," he added, with a wink, "it runs better.

I do not know whether I have done wisely in making these facts public.

For there are many people who might easily sell their absence at a good figure—if they only understood the art.—Fred Bayham, in The Argonaut.

A Suicide's Bargain,

"I know three men who are going to commit suicide," was the striking remark made by Dr. Wagner, the county Coroner.

"Are you going to take any steps to prevent them from working out their purpose?"

"No. If a man is in his right mind and is sure he is ready to leave this world, I do not know any way to prevent him. There are a thousand ways by which a man may take his life, and the man who may be called a 'confirmed suicide' will sooner or later accomplish his purpose."

The Doctor ran his right index finger over the tips of his left hand fingers and counted up to eleven.

I know of eleven men who told me they were bound to commit suicide. They now fill snicide's graves, and I, though aware of their purpose, was powerless to prevent it. Nearly every man, I suppose has friends who are possessed of the suicide mania. Certainly, every coroner has had experiences of this kind.

"I recently had an extraordinary confidence reposed in me. You remember that an esteemed and rich German citizen, living on North New Jersey Street, died under peculiar circumstances some weeks ago. He was a Democrat, and, as you know, I was nominated and elected Coroner as a Republican. Just before the election the German in question came to me with this proposition:—

"Dr. Wagner, I will vote for you if you will make me one promise.

"'Name it.'

"'If you are elected Coroner I want you to promise that you will not cut me open when I am found dead.'

"'Do you mean to say that you are about to commit suicide?'

"'I am just tired of living, and I want you to promise what I ask.'

"I was not able to dissuade the man from his purpose, and I suppose he voted for me. I was not much surprised last month, therefore, to be called upon to investigate his death. I knew what was the trouble, and no autopsy was necessary."—From the Indianapolis News.

Married on the Run.

One of the most exciting weddings on record occurred here recently—writes a Newport, Ky., correspondent of the New York Press. W. P, Welden and Miss Lulu Bever drove forty miles from Williamstown at break-neck speed to get here ahead of the girl's angry father, who opposed the marriage. They went immediately to the court house, where they were refused a license. A hack was secured, and the anxious couple drove to Dayton, Ky., to the residence of County Clerk Jones. After some persuasion the old gentleman agreed to issue a license. Squire Hallen was found, and the quartette—squire, hackman and lovers—started for this city. While en route the bride espied her father down the road driving like mad. The squire could not marry the couple until he got inside the coporation lines. The hackman had his horses going in a wild gallop. At last they approached the line. The couple stood up and clasped hands; Squire Hallen braced himself against the seat, and clasping the fond hands, watched for the line. By this time the father was within ten feet, yelling as the hack dashed across the line, and, while it was rocking like a boat in a storm Hallen married the pair. The father concluded to forgive the couple, and the party returned home.

Effect of Inventions on Labor.

An illustration of the manner in which changes in style and the introducton of new inventions injure whole classes of people, sometimes by throwing them out of employment, is the fashion of wearing russet shoes in summer, which takes away the employment of the boot blacks, and kills the demand for polish blacking. The owners of the shoes save thirty-five cents per week, and the boys have to seek other employment. Every introduction of new machinery produces similar results. Electricity, as a motive power, has bankrupted hnndreds whose plants are only adapted to making steam engines, and will do away with the use of thousands of horses on street car lines, and many think the day not far off when all lines of railroad will be operated by electric power, with storage batteries. Farm machinery has lessened the number of farm hands needed, and further inventions will no doubt ,reduce the number still further, and in other directions and employments machinery is doubtless destined to supplant hand labor to a much larger degree. In the process of readjustment, thousands suffer loss, and so rapidly do changes occur that the number affected is constantly increasing, though on the rule of the greatest good to the greatest number these changes are beneficient and must go on.

Rheumatism

Is of two kind,s acute and chronic. The former is accompanied by high fever, and in the swollen joints there is intense pain, which often suddenly changes from one part of the body to another. Chronic rheumatism is without fever and not so severe, but more continuous, and liable to come on at every storm or after slight exposure. Rheumatism is known to be a disease of the blood and Hood's Sarsaparilla has had great success in curing it. This medicine possesses qualities which neutralize acidity, and purify, enrich and vitalize the blood.

When Bagpipes Had No Charms.

An amusing episode recorded of the Peninsular war seems to prove that even the charms of our beautiful national bagpipes fail to soothe these savage beasts! It happened that, while one of the Highland regiments was marching across a desolate part of Spain, one of the pipers for some inexplicable reason found himself separated from his comrades. Halting on a lonely plain, he sat down to eat his breakfast, when, to his horror, he saw wolves approaching. When they came very near he flung them all the food he had with him, fully conscious, however, that this meagre meal would not stay their advance for many seconds. With the calmness of desperation he then said: "As ye've had the meat ye'll hae the music, too," and thereupon he proceeded to "blow up his chanter." No sooner did his unwelcome guests hear the first "skirl" of the pipes than they turned in wild terror and fled as fast as their long legs would carry them. "De'il hae ye!" said the piper; "had I thocht ye were so fond o' the music ye wad hae gotten it afore meat, instead o' after!" Then hungrily he went his way, not forgetting from time to time to blow a blast so wild and shrill as might effectually scare any prowling foes.—Temple Bar.

No Sense of Humor.

There are various ways of coming to grief, when one attempts telling another's stories.

"Annie, tell that anecdote Cousin Oliver told the other night, please," said a young lady to her sister while they were making a call. When Annie had complied, her sister announced sympathetically, to the company. "You can imagine how funny it was because Oliver tells a story so well!"

Another unfortunate relator of a borrowed tale who ventured to ask an intimate friend, "Why don't you wear a wig?"

"I'd rather dye," was the answer, and though the punn was an old one it happened to be a new one to the hearer, and greatly amused him—not so much that he did not speedily forget the point.

That night, on returning home, he said to his wife, "Richardson said an awfully good thing this afternoon. I asked him why he didn't wear a wig, and he said he'd rather commit suicide than do such a thing. Why don't you laugh? But then, women haven't any sense of humor to speak of!"

The myriad-minded Shakspere says: "Throw physic to the dogs." A great many people have an idea that Mother Nature has provided remedies for all the ills that flesh is heir to. and that they can be found without the intervention of medical colleges or drug-compounders. In support of this they point to thousands of people who have regained health at the various medicinal springs that send forth their healing waters in various parts of the United States. In the West. the most celebrated of these natural sanitariums is the Hot Springs of Arkansas. In curative power it out ranks all others of the world. The average number of visitors is over one hundred thousand a year, coming not only from all states of the Union, but Europe and South America. The best route to the Hot Springs from the Northwest is "The Burlington." which has its own track from St. Paul and Minneapolis to St. Louis, making close connections with trains for the Sprrings. It also runs every Saturday evening a through sleeping car from the Twin Cities to Hot Springs without change. Any agent of "The Burlington" or connecting lines can supply you with tickets, or you can write write to W.J.C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agent, C. B. N. & R. R., St. Paul, Minn.

Things Worth Remembering.

That it is dangerous to stand near a tall tree or spire during a thunder storm.

That the southwest corner of the cellar is the "cyclone safety point."

That there is no medicine so universally applicable to sickness as fresh air and sunshine."

That blowing out the gas before retiring is funny—to every one except the one who tries it.

That you may swear as hard as you please but it will not remove grease spots.

That the Wisconsin Central is the most popular line between Minneapolis and St. Paul and Milwaukee and Chicago.

That its fast train leaves Minneapolis daily at 6:25 p. m., St. Paul at 7:15 p. m., with through Pullman sleepers, arriving in Milwaukee at 7:27 and Chicago at 9:59 the following morning, serving breakfast in dining car.

That before starting on a trip always get information from some reliable ticket agent, and that nowhere will such information be more cheerfully given than at the city ticket offices of the Wisconsin Central, No. 19, Nicollet House block, Minneapolis, and 162 East 3d st, cor. ECHOES OF THE RAPIDS

The NEWS has increased its working force, having found it necessary from the rush of business.

Erve McCaffrey was under the weather several days after the New Year festivities, but is O. K. again.

J. P. Ralph is over from West Superior, arrived just in time to put out the fire in his Main st block.

The holidays and fair are passed and as a consequence less sleepy eyes greet you in a morning walk.

Tom W[illegible] who has several times [illegible] came in from Red La[illegible]

Ovide Moreau was over from Terrebone yesterday. The farmers up there are fully aroused over the county seat question.

Manager Marshall had a baking of his fancy patent tested and the verdict was: "Equal to Pillsbury's best." That ought to be pretty good flour.

Cash paid for barley, oats, flax' hide pelts. All kinds of coal for sale—at Hokins & Co.'s elevator.

The ladies of the Presbyterian church give a "Clothes Pin" sociable next Thursday evening at the residence of F. E. Hunt. All are cordially invited to attend.

The death of Emma Abbott no doubt, was the topic of conversation in almost every home in America. How sad for one so talented, so meritorious, and yet young, to die!

Geo. Brunelle was celebrating the arrival of a new son this week, who was born Sunday. This is the 5th son born to Mr. and Mrs. Brunelle. We offer congratulations.

The bakery building on Main st was discovered to be on fire Monday a. m. A crowd gathered and soon extingushed the flames, but not until a hundred dollars damage had been done to contents. No insurance.

Wm. Gray arrived from the Pacific coast Saturday and departed for the Red Lake country Monday. Mr. Gray is enamoured with our climate. (Well who wouldent be?) Where he came from they are having their wet season, wearing rubber boots. It is much more pleasant here just now.

The Last Session

Of the old Board of County Commissioners, Who Have Been on Duty

For the Past Four Years--Full and Official Proceedings Given Herewith.

The following letter from the State Examiner with reference to the request of the grand Jury that an examination of the books of the treasurer and auditor be made, were read to the Board:

St. Paul, Dec. 13, 1890.

Hon. H. Thompson. Chairman Board of County Comissioners.

Dear Sir: Your favor of the 12th at hand. I have sent Mr. McGuire a copy of examination made on Oct. 11th which no doubt he will exhibit to the B'd. I do not think the proposed extended examination from organization down, would be needed or desirable. If there are any specific charges, this office will examine and report on same without cost to the county, and will make the examination as soon as possible.

It would be impossible to estimate cost of examination proposed, unless I was informed as to scope of same. If only covered the receipt and payment of money without investigation as to propriety of payment, and without comparison of stubs, etc., with tax books, the cost ought not to be great.

The commissioners, if they had reason to think there had been malfeasance in office, would have the power to investigate and charge the cost of doing so to the county, but as such investigation is directly in line with the duties of this office, I think the points to be so investigated should first be suggested to this office, and a reasonable time and opportunity given to make any supplemental examination by this office without submitting the county to the expense of a special examination of all its affairs from the beginning.

I can assure you that this office will cooperate with the Board as far as possible and consistent with its duties, to the end of investagating the matter pertaining to county officers without expense to the county,

Respectfully
M. D. KENYON
Public Examiner.

St. Paul, Dec. 18, 1890-

Hon. Hugh Thompson, Fisher Minn.

Dear Sir: I had somewhat intended to try and meet with your board on the 22nd inst. but find it doubtful if I can do so.

I think if your board have complaints as to management of any officer or as to conduct, that you should require the person making the charges to do so in writing, before determining what you as a board will do. At least there should be some explicit, definite charge to act upon and not some vague statement, as I do not think the board should go to any considerable expense in such matter, unless there is reasn to believe there is something wrong.

I think, if possible, either myself or deputy will meet the board on Jan. 6 1891, and if you defer action until then and report then whatever charges have been made, and this office will arrange at what time, in what line, and how far we can co-operate, and so far as time will permit, will make as much supplemental examination of the period covered by our former examination as may seem necessary and desireable,

Yours Respectfully.
M. D. KENYON,
Public Examiner

GOOD WORDS FOR RETIRING MEMBERS.

The board of county commissioners of Polk county, now in session, deem it appropriate, at this their last meeting of the year 1690, to express their sentiments in appreciation of the retiring members of the board and of the county auditor, as clerk of the board. The remaining members of this board hereby express their sincere regret that Messrs. Hugh Thompson and Frank E. Hunt the commisionrs respectively of the 2d and 4th districts now retire. We feel that Mr. Hunt and Mr. Thompson have been untiring in serving the true interests of the people of their districts and of the people of the peopie of the county at large; that they have rendered invaluable service to this board as well as to the people of the county, by funding the county debt, lowering the rate of interest on the county indebtedness, by bringing county orders up to par value, and now having in the treasury a surplus, by lowering the rate of taxation, by closely scrutinizing bills and accounts against the county, by appointing faithful men to fill vacancies, in fine, for acting as intelligent, upright and faithful servants of the people, and having no private ends or interests to prejudice their actions, and for their gentlemanly conduct toward their associate members, and all persons having business before this board. We regret the retiring of these two members and also our county auditor, Mr. P. J. McGuire, who has as clerk of this board always acted promptly, conscientiously, and intelligently; who has as county auditor well and faithfully served the the people of this county with a degree of intelligence and zeal which should entitle him to the lasting gratitude and confidence of the people, and we wish the people no better than that they may in future be served as well and faithfully as they have been by these three retiring officers.

Board adjourned sine die.

S. A. KEAN.

Many ministers were included among the depositors, also the Women's Christian Temperance Union and other religious [illegible] charitable organizations. It is asserted that the assets of the bank will not pay more than five cents for each dollar of indebtedness.

Mr. Kean is a native of Pennsylvani[illegible] and was born fifty-four years ago. [illegible] bank was founded in 1860, the firm then being Preston, Williard & Kean. After the fire of 1871 it became Preston, Kean & Co. Mr. Preston retired some time ago, and since then the management of affairs has been practically in the hands of Mr. Kean.

The "Messiah" of Kansas City.

When Reuben Carter, colored, lived at Pomeroy, Kan., he was known as "Cranky Rube." He inspired neither awe nor respect among the members of his race, so he shook the dust of Pomeroy from his feet and sought a more congenial field of labor at Kansas City.

"When yo' staht, staht big" is a southwestern maxim, and Mr. Carter took it to heart. Arrived at the Missouri metropolis he "started big" and succeeded. Going to a portion of the city known as "Hell's Half Acre" he announced to the awe-struck negro inhabitants that he was the Messiah, and that in due season he would lead those who believed on him to the promised land. Chief of Police Sp[illegible] granted the man permission to hold religious meetings, and a regular craze has ensued among the Afro-Americans. Carter, who is a coal black native of Liberia, about 45 years of age, has set them frantic.

REUBEN CARTER.

He appeared at a recent gathering of his disciples attired in a loose robe of black cloth that reached from his shoulders to his heels. Here is the introductory part of his address:

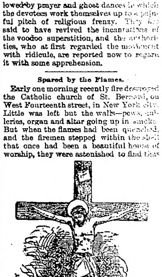
> O brothers and beloved sisters, your Christ is before you! Your Lord is here! He has come to rescue you from the clutches of the white man. You are my children, my brothers, my sisters, and I am here to save you and to carry you to the New Canaan which the Lord God Almighty has prepared expressly for his chosen ones. You, my black brothers, and you, my dark sisters, all the dark people are his chosen ones, and for you has that Canaan been prepared. Will you go, O my children? Dare you trust yourselves to me?

Carter described the promised land as paved with silver, while the houses are of gold and have windows of diamonds. The white people are to be destroyed before the negroes enter into this gorgeous inheritance.

The "Messiah's" sermons are always followed by prayer and ghost dances in which the devotees work themselves up to a painful pitch of religious frenzy. They are said to have revived the incantations of the voodoo superstition, and the authorities, who at first regarded the movement with ridicule, are reported now to regard it with some apprehension.

Spared by the Flames.

Early one morning recently fire destroyed the Catholic church of St. Bernard, on West Fourteenth street, in New York city. Little was left but the walls—pews, galleries, organ and altar going up in smoke. But when the flames had been quenched, and the firemen stepped within the shell that once had been a beautiful house of worship, they were astonished to find that the figure of the crucifixion on the gospel side of the church, where the blaze had raged fiercest, was uninjured. All about it lay scorched and blackened debris, but the paint on the woodwork of the cross and on the image of the Saviour was not even blistered.



THE UNSCORCHED CROSS.

Naturally the affair created a good deal of excitement and comment. Father Healy, the pastor, removed the relic to the parlors of his residence, where it was viewed by numbers of parishioners. St. Bernard's was the first church dedicated by Cardinal McCloskey in New York city.

A KEEN-LOOKING passenger on an English railroad lately remarked, in the hearing of one of the company's officials, how easy it was to "do" the company. "I often travel," he said, "from Broad street to Dalston Junction without a ticket. Any one can do it. I did it recently." When he alighted he was followed by the official, who asked him, in a pleasant and affable way, how it was to be done. The wily traveler agreed to tell for a substantial consideration. This was given. "Now," said the eager official, "how did you go from Broad street to Dalston Junction yesterday without a ticket?" "Well," was the reply, "I walked."

Took Him at His Word.

On the day succeeding the one on which Mrs Langtry first landed in this country, a popular and wealthy gentleman, whom I shall refer to merely as Col. C., as he is now dead, called upon the Jersey Lily at the Albemarle Hotel, and presented a letter of indroduction, written by a friend in London. He was courteously received of course. The Colonel suggested that the lady should take a look at the town, and for this purpose gallantly placed himself at her service. The offer was accepted, and a stroll upon Fifth Avenue and Broadway followed. Among the places visited was Tiffany's. Mrs. Langtry was very much interested in what she saw.

Thinking that she might fancy some trifle she inspected as a memento of the visit, and at the same time to add to the apparently favorable immpression he had made, the Colonel, with a gracious bow, said, addressing his fair companion:

"If you see anything here that pleases your fancy, Mrs Langtry, it will afford me much pleasure to have it sent up to your hotel."

The Jersey Lily strolled along glancing at the showcases apparently in an indifferent frame of mind. Presently she paused before a case filled with diamonds. After a hasty but critical examination of the jewels, she said, pointing to a magnificent necklace of steel-white diamonds nearly as large as filberts; "I think you may as well send that one up."

The Colonel stood aghast for a second, but did the best to conceal his chargin. As soon as he bade the lady good-bye at the entrance to the Albemarle, the Colonel hastened back to Tiffany's.

"What is the price of the necklace Mrs. Langtry selected?" he asked in a tremor of excitement.

"Seven thousand five hundred dollars!" was the cool response of the late Col. McClure, the head of the diamond department. Col. C. fell back in a fit. The diamonds were sent, but when after that the Colonel called at the Albemarle, the Lily was invariably "not at home."—From the New York Star.

A Railroad as a Civilizer.

From the New York Sun.

The great railroad which Russia has begun to build across Sibera to the Pacific Ocean will cost an appalling amount of money, considering the present condition of that country's finances. One of the arguments with which the expenditure of such an enormous sum is supported is very remarkable. Some leading men in Russia and influential newspapers advocate this line as a military necessity, in veiw of the possibility that some day the enormous hordes of China may again attempt to swarm far westward, and to even threaten Europe as the fierce warriors of Genghis Khan did nearly seven centuries ago. Western observers may be inclined to regard such an influx of Orientals as a possibility so remote as to be hardly worth considering. But some Russian statesmen look upon Russia as a bulwark which some day may save Europe from an inudation of Eastern barbarians.

FARMERS' ALLIANCE

Nearly a Thousand Members Assemble in State Convention at St. Paul.

Ignatius Donnelly, President--Miss McDonald State Lecturer--the Platform.

The great convention of the Farmers' Alliance met in St. Paul, and contrary to expectation there was no great fight between the Donnelly and Anti-Donnelly factors, and Mr. Donnelly was promptly elected President by the surprising vote of 592 for Donnelly, 105 for Halvorsen, 6 for Hall and 2 for Owen. Most of the first day was spent in organizing the convention, an unwieldy committee on credentials, causing a long delay, but the time was occupied with the delivery of speeches by Mr. Donnelly, by Mr. Ashley of Iowa, lecturer of the National Farmers' Alliance; H. L. Loucks of South Dakota, president of the Alliance of that state and late candidate for governor on the independent ticket; Mr. Donnelly and Miss Eva McDonald. Mr. Ashley detailed at length the difference between the National Farmers' Alliance, which is distinctively the Northern organization, and the National Farmers' Alliance and industrial union. The Southern or secret order, which recently held its convention at Ocala, and adopted the famous "subtreasury platform." An attempt had been made at St. Louis to unite the two, but an organic union at that time was deemed inadvisable and impossible owing to inherent differences in the specific ends sought to be reached by each, although their ultimate aim, the emancidation of the industrial and producing classes, was identical.

THE REPRESENTATIVES.

The committee on credentials finally made a report, showing 679 delegates entitled to seats among the counties as follows:

EX-PRESIDENT HALL'S REPORT.

At the second day's session Ex-President Hall introduced and read his annual report, as follows:

Mr. Hall reviewed the binding twine trouble and requested the coming legislature to make a thorough investigation of the methods of the board of managers of the Stillwater prison. He recommended that the convention select a legislative committee whose duty it shall be to secure the passage of a law that shall put four systems of American machinery to manufacture twine at the St. Cloud reformatory, during next season.

The inspection of grain at Duluth was touched upon. Farmers and shippers, he contended, were being plundered at that point. He recommended the erection by the state of public warehouses, where the producer may store his grain unmixed, in a special bin at actual cost, at Duluth and at the agricultural fair grounds.

Referring to the troubles in the Alliance during the late convention, Mr. Hall said:

"I have no hesitancy in saying that had it not been for the attacks made on the Alliance candidates by the Great West, S. M. Owen would be the next governor. I have no apologies to make for the Alliance campaign committee. To say the least they are the peers of the men who slandered and defamed them. I am informed that there is nearly $1,000 shortage. The Farmers' Alliance should take immediate action to wipe out the debt."

The report went to the committee on resolutions.

THE ALLIANCE FINANCES.

Gen. J. H. Baker then made his first public appearance on the scene of action to move the adoption of a resolution of thanks to President Hall, which went through with a cheer by a unanimous rising vote. Mr. Donnelly then wanted to put in his advice, but at the suggestion of John Diamond he gave way to the report of the treasurer, H. P. Bjorge, one of the representatives-elect from Otter Tail county, which showed a balance of $10,785. A. L. Stromberg, who wears John Lathrop's shoes with dignity and grace, also presented a report of the financial transactions of his office since Sept. 10. There was a disposition to ask John Lathrop for an accounting, but it was headed off by a report from H. V. Poore, chairman of the finance committee. This report reviewed the entire difficulty between Mr. Lathrop and members of the executive committee, which has already been aired in the public press.

EVA MCDONALD WINS.

Nominations were received for state lecturer. There were a host of aspirants—Gen. Baker, Dr. Fish, J. O. Barrett, Carrington Phelps, G. W. Muller, Miss Eva McDonald, J. M. Bowler, James Ball. The question was raised as to whether Miss McDonald was a practical farmer. President Donnelly ruled that she and Fish were both eligible. It was decided to have the first ballot informal, and the call of counties began. The vote was badly scattered, resulting as follows: J. H. Baker, 130; Ball, 4; Poore, 2; O. H. Page, 6; Dr. Fish, 148; J. O. Barrett, 86; Phelps, 21; Eva McDonald 227; J. M. Bowler, 15. A motion to make Miss McDonald's election unanimous was headed off by Carrington Phelps, who withdrew in favor of Gen. Baker. Dr. Fish paid a high tribute to Miss McDonald, but felt convinced that she was not eligible, and also withdrew in favor of Mr. Baker.

Miss McDonald's adherents saw a good chance for a nice play and rushed that lady to the platform, where she made a little talk for herself and said she did not propose to retire from the fight, although she had not been a candidate of her own volition. A formal vote was ordered. The natural gallantry of the tillers of the soil carried them away and it all went the lady's way. She won by a vote of 436 to 209. Mr Donnelly introduced her as a another illustration of the fact that "the hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that moves the world." She acknowledged she had wanted the office and was glad she got it, and would do the best she could to fill it.

THE PLATFORM.

Gen. Baker presented the delcaration of principles, over which the committee had studied all night. It is a lengthy document and reads as follows:

The Farmer's Alliance of the State of Minnesota in convention asembled, hereby ordain and establish the following declaration of principles.

First.—We demand that the "war tariff," which has too long survived the object of its creation, shall be radically revised, giving very material reductions in the necessaries of life and placing raw material on the free list to the end that we may compete with the world for a market, and that such luxuries as whisky and tobacco shall in no manner be relieved from internal taxation till the high protection tariff has been wholly divested of its extortions, and we especially denounce the McKinley bill as the crowning infamy of protection.

Second.—We demand government control of railways, both by state and nation, to the end that all discriminations shall cease; that reasonable rates shall be established; that watered stock shall not receive the reward of honest capital; that the pooling of rates is such an element of monopoly as should be absolutely prohibited; that our legislature shall enact a freight rate law which shall fix rates no higher than those now in force in Iowa, and the reduction of railroad passenger rates to two cents per mile. We anticipate the ultimate ownership of railroads by the government as the solution of this question.

Third.—As producers we demand free and open markets for our grain, and that the railways shall receive and ship grain as they receive and ship other commodities for the owner to its destination. That the grading of wheat at country stations be abolished, and grain be bought and sold upon its merits; that the right to establish side tracks to grain warehouses and the equal use of cars shall in no manner be abridged.

Fourth.—We demand the maintenance of the present freedom of traffic law, the present grain laws and the law for the distribution of cars and the erection by the state of public warehouses where the producer shall store his grain unmixed in special bins at actual cost, at Duluth and the agricultural fair grounds, and we demand that the legislature shall thoroughly investigate the method of handling, inspecting and weighing grain under existing rules. We demand a law forbidding any railroad corporation from issuing any mortgage bonds or stock until an itemized account of the cash, labor or property duly sworn to, has been presented to some officer of the state for examination, and if found to be a true account of the money, labor property received, to register and certify to the same as issued in pursuance of law and as constituting a part of the capital stock of such corporation.

Fifth.—Our public lands shall be reserved in small quantities without cost to actual settlers only, and we favor laws for the protection of our forests. Alien ownership of land should be prohibited, and we demand the forfeiture and restoration to the public domain of all unearned land grants.

Sixth.—The present high rate of interest is unjust; it should be reduced to 7 per cent. per annum, with stringent penalties to prevent money loaners from exacting a higher rate.

Seventh.—We favor an increase in the volume of money equal to the requirements of increasing trade and business. We demand the free coinage of silver, and condemn the silver bill as a fraud upon the people.

Eighth.—All public offices which affect the interests of the people should be made electoral; therefore we hold that United States senators and railway commissioners should be elected by popular vote, and also the superintendent of public instruction.

We ask the next legislature to establish the Australian system of voting for the whole state, and that election day be made a legal holiday.

Tenth.—We demand the prohibition of the employment of children under fifteen years in the mills, shops, factories and workshops of the country, and we also favor the adoption of the factory and mine inspecting law and the employer's liability act, and we favor the publication of free text books.

Eleventh.—We favor the settlement of all strikes by arbitration, and equal pay for equal work, irrespective of sex, also for shorter hours of labor in factories, stores and public works, and we also favor a lien law that will give labor a first lien on its products.

Twelfth.—We are opposed to the giving away of valuable franchises by the state and municipalities.

Thirteenth.—That we hold that mortgage indebtedness should be deducted from the tax on reality whether such mortgage is held at home or abroad, and we ask such laws as will make the hidden property pay equal taxes with the visible property.

Fourteenth.—We believe in a graded income tax for corporations and individuals to the end that wealth shall be compelled to contribute its share to the various burdens of taxation.

Fifteenth.—That the salaries of all our public officers, state and county, should be reduced to correspond with the reduced income of the producers and working people.

Sixteenth.—That in obedience to a reasonable demand we request the coming legislature to submit the question of constitutional prohibition to a vote of the people.

Seventeenth.—That we renew to the soldiers whose valor saved the nation the expression of our profoundest gratitude, and we declare that it is the sense of the American people that the men who fought for the Union shall receive liberal pensions, and that the same generous spirit should be extended to the widows and orphans of the heroes of the war.

Eighteenth.—That while we still believe that the convict labor of the state could, if honestly directed, furnish cheap binding twine to the farmers of Minnesota, yet, as it appears that it is the manifest purpose of the present management of the penitentiary to thwart that just desire, we demand of the present legislature a thorough investigation of that institution and of the recent purchase of a system of twine machinery, and if necessary for its radical reformation, and the removal of the penitentiary from its present location.

Nineteenth.—We demand the passage of the Conger lard bill now before the United States senate and such further legislation as may be necessary to control the traffic in adultrated food products.

Twentieth—That auction gambling on boards of trade should be abolished, and we ask the state and congress to pass such laws as to make all such transactions a criminal offense.

Twenty-first.—We denounce the force bill now pending in congress as a dangerous and revolutionary measure, devised for partisan purposes. It will open the wounds of the war and retard the happy day of regeneration and peace, and we hold that one of the grandest aims of the Alliance is the restoration of fraternal feeling and true concord to the people of the republic.

Twenty-second—That the governmental methods of dealing with the Indians is illogical, imbecile and expensive. The entire management in all its details should be promptly transferred to the war department, and our bold pioneers saved from perpetual menace of life and property, to which American citizens should be no longer exposed.

Twenty-third.—That we demand that the government foreclose its lien on the Union Pacific railroad and take possession, and operate the same in the interests of the people of the United States, and we do not approve the report of Senater Davis, of this state, on that question.

Twenty-fourth.—That the Alliance deems it unwise and mindicious to establish an organ, but regards with favor and will encourage with its support all papers which espouse its cause and defend its principles.

Twenty-fifth.—That we invite all industrial organizations of kindred principles with our own to federate with the Farmers' Alliance each maintaining its seperate and distinct identity, with a view to confederating them into one grand union.

After the resolutions, the constitution, and many other things were debated the convention adjourned.

Preliminary suggestions for plans for the government building at the world's fair were received at Chicago from Washington. They provide for a building 350 feet wide and 450 feet long, with a dome 160 feet high. It will be subject to change when the board of architects meet Jan. 10. The building is not to be a permanent one.

Death Comes Painlessly.

The signs of impending death are many and variable. No two instances are precisely identical, yet several signs are common to many cases. Shakespere, who observed everything else, observed and recorded some of the premonitory signs of death, also. In the account of the death of Falstaff the sharpness of the nose, the coldness of the fee gradually extending upward, and the picking at the bed clothes as accurately described.

For some time before death indications of its approach become apparent. Speech grows thick and labored; the hands, if raised, fall instantly, the respiration is difficult, the heart loses its power to propel the blood to the extremities, which consequently become cold; a clammy moisture oozes through the pores of the skin, the voice grows weak and husky or piping, the eyes begin to lose their luster. In death at old age there is a gradual dulling of all the bodily senses and of many of the mental faculties; memory fails, judgment wavers, imagination goes out like a candle. The muscles and tendons get stiff, the voice breaks, the cords of the tabernacle are loosening. Small noises irritate, sight becomes dim, nutrition goes on feebly, digestion is impaired, the secretions are insufficient or vitiated or cease, capillary circulation is clogged. Finally, the central organ of the circulation comes to a stop—a full stop—and this stoppage means a dissolution. This is the death of old age, which few attain to.

Many people have an idea that death is necessarily painful, even agonizing; but there is no reason whatever to suppose that death is more painful than birth. It is because in a certain proportion of cases dissolution is accompanied by a visible spasm and distortion of the countenance that the idea exists, but it is nearly as certain as anything can be that these distortions of the facial muscles are not only painless, but take place unconsciously. In many instances, too, a comatose, or semi-comatose state supervenes, and it is altogether probable that more or less complete unconsciousness then prevails. We have, too, abundant evidence of people who have been nearly drowned and resuscitated, and they all agree in the statement that after a few moments of painful struggling, fear and anxiety pass away, and a state of tranquility succeeds. They see the visions of green fields and in some cases, hear pleasing music, and, so far from being miserable, their sensations are delightful. But where attempts at resuscitation are successful, the resuscitated persons almost invariably protest against being brought back to life, and declare that resuscitation is accompanied by physical pain and accute mental misery.

Death is a fact which every man must personally experience, and consequently is of universal interest, and, as facts are facts, the wiser course is to look them squarely in the face, for necessity is coal black, and death keeps no calendar.—Medical Journal.

The Nose for News.

Frank Ottarson was night editor one night. About 11 o'clock Mr. Greeley said to him: "Ottarson, there will be such and such a paper from this state by mail to-night, and there will be a nomination in it, and I want you to get it in the Tribune." The expected nomination was from a Congressional district to which there was a great deal of interest attached. The paper came and "Ot" looked over it, but could not find the nomination; so the Tribune went to press without it. Next morning Greeley asked for Ottarson. Mr. Rooker sent for him and said: "Greeley wants to see you. There's something wrong."

"Oh, I know what it is," said "Ot" "He wanted me to get a nomination out of a paper that came and it was not in."

"Well, let's see what it is," said Mr. Rooker. They went to Mr. Greeley, who hailed the night editor with: "Why didn't you get that nomination up?"

"It didn't come."

"You lie. Here it is in the Times. I know it came."

"Well," said poor old "Ot," "I don't know where they got it. I looked all through and couldn't find it."

"Show me the paper," said Mr. Greeley.

The paper was hunted up and Mr. Greeley looked at it and immediately said:

"There it is."

"Well, I didn't see it," said Ottarson.

"See it!" was the reply. "You ought to smell it. You ought to smell news."

GENERAL MASTER WORKMAN POWDERLY, in an interview with a Philadelphia newspaper reporter said that a determination by the Knights of Labor to take independent political action does not necessarily mean the formation of a new political party. What the knights want, he said, is a political platform on which they and other organizations can unite, leaving in abeyance the question as to the forces and political machinery best adapted to giving their ideas practical effect.

A rumor was current to-night that Gen. Miles had been killed, but the report was unfounded.

ON WHITE RIVER.

LINCOLN, Neb., Jan. 4.—Specials to the Journal from Pine Ridge confirm the report of an engagement between Gen. Carr's command and the Indians on White river. It is believed that no one was killed, though several Indians were wounded. An Indian courier brings a message from the hostile camp, the substance of which is a demand that all soldiers withdraw from the locality, and, further, that they will treat with no one for peace but the vice-president of the United States or the commissioner of Indian affairs.

This message came direct from the hitherto supposed friendly chief Red Cloud. Roving bands continue to scout the country in the vicinity of Pine Ridge. A man named Miller, formerly a government herder, was found five miles from the agency. His body was riddled with bullets. Many persons coming in tell of narrow escapes. The Indian training school at Pine Ridge was burned last night, no loss of life resulting.

The friendly spies all say that there are a large number of warriors in the enemy's camp who have worked themselves up to a condition of frenzy similar to those who committed suicide at Wounded Knee; they say they want to die, and are going to die while killing white men. It is also said that two bucks escaped alive from the Wounded Knee fight who swore that they will set the agency on fire and kill the agent themselves.

Gen. Miles sent out a letter yesterday asking for a hearing. The Indians tore the letter to fragments and threw them into the fire, saying: "We want no treaty; we are here to fight."

This forenoon, in accordance with instructions telegraphed from Washington, Gen. Forsythe was relieved of his command of the Seventh cavalry pending investigation of the Wounded Knee affair. Maj. Whiteside succeeds to the command of the regiment. Maj. Whiteside says that the affair was an accident; that a few moments before the fighting begun the squaws were merrily pelting the searching party with bundles of rags. The accepted reason for Gen. Forsythe's relief is the manner in which his troops were placed in the fight.

At Least a Thousand Young Warriors Start to Join the Hostiles.

FORT YATES, N. D., Jan. 4.—A large number of the young warriors of the Standing Rock agency have gone south to join the hostiles in the Bad Lands. The discovery was made on issuing rations that they did not come to the agency, and one of the friendlies stated that they had armed themselves and gone to join the bands in revolt. How many have gone is only conjectured, but the indications point to at least 1,000 desertions.

The Grand River Sioux have been fomenting trouble ever since the killing of Sitting Bull, and they have not been slow in manifesting their intense anger to Agent McLaughlin. Most of them regard the taking off of the old medicine man as murder outright, and it has been common talk for three weeks that the reds would accept the first opportunity offered to massacre the whites.

The detachment of the Eighth cavalry, under Capt. Fountain, will move rapidly southward and Company H, of the Twenty-second infantry, now near New England City, will come to this point and move thence southward to aid in squelching the uprising. Troops are also in readiness to take the field from Fort Lincoln, and the detachment of the Twenty-fifth infantry at Fort Keogh is expected to march in a southeasterly direction. Every hour increases the number of the hostiles.

VIA THE CAPITAL.

None of the Indian Scouts or Police Join the Hostiles.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4.—The commissioner of Indian affairs has, in response to a telegram sent to Agent Boyer at the Pine Ridge agency, inquiring as to whether any of the Indian scouts or police have joined the hostiles, received the following reply from the agent dated the 3d:

"None of our enlisted scouts have joined the hostiles. Capt. Seward gave three permission to go to the hostile camp after their families who have not yet returned. Police and scouts are rendering good service, and by their vigorous firing prevented the hostiles from burning agency buildings."

A reporter to-night called the attention of the commissioner to the reports from Pine Ridge, saying that Gen. Miles had recommended the removal of the Indian agents at Pine Ridge and at other places, and to the statement that the Indians were slowly starving to death. The commissioner said that so far as the agents were concerned there was no evidence that there had been any dishonesty on their part in distributing supplies. He said he was preparing for publication a full statement of the amount of supplies voted by congress and distributed to the Indians. The commissioner has submitted to the president a statement covering the question of the charge made that the agreements with the Indians have not been fulfilled.

Not a Food Flue.

NORTHFIELD, Minn., Special Telegram, Jan. 4.—A store valued at $1,000, belonging to L. Tschann and occupied by John Hoben, was entirely gutted to-day by flames starting from a defective flue. The contents were saved and the building was insured for $300.

Burned at West Superior.

WEST SUPERIOR, Wis., Special Telegram, Jan. 4.—The handsome brick and stone office building of the Labelle Wagon company was burned to-day. The fire originated in the basement. Loss, $2,500; fully insured.

GLADSTONE AND PARNELL.

The Former Will Not Retire, Though the Latter May.

LONDON, Jan. 5.—The Daily Telegraph (Liberal) says it is authorized to deny the report of Mr. Gladstone's intended retirement from the Liberal leadership.

The Times repeats its acceptance of William O'Brien's denials that he was a contributor to the Irish World. However, it adds, "but in regard to his (O'Brien's) assertion that the Irish World is not still preaching dynamite, we can only reproduce Mr. Ford's own words from his issue of Dec. 13, assuming the responsibility of an honest interpretation of the term 'dynamites.'

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News says: "There are the strongest grounds to believe that Figaro is well informed in declaring that Mr. Parnell insists on the resignation of Justin McCarthy from his leadership as the condition for his own retirement till he married Mrs. O'Shea. Galignani says it learns from an intimate friend of Mr. O'Brien that if the negotiations with Mr. Parnell be brought to a satisfactory conclusion within three weeks, then Mr. O'Brien will submit to the sentence of imprisonment passed on him.

"IN THE HANDS OF HIS FRIENDS.

DUBLIN, Jan. 4.—Mr. Parnell and his sister, Mrs. Dickinson, spent Sunday at the Marine hotel at Brano. Mr. Parnell left Kingstown to-night for London, whither Timothy Harrington will follow him to-morrow. Mr. Parnell, accompanied by Mr. Harrington, will start on Tuesday for Boulgne-Sur-Mer, where Messrs. John Redmond and Clancy await him. It is understood that Mr. Parnell has "placed himself in the hands of his friends."

At a county convention of the Gaelic league at South Sligo to-day resolutions were adopted condemning Mr. Parnell and calling for the retirement of Edmund Leamy, who represents South Sligo in parliament on account of his support of Parnell.

FURIOUS ITALIANS.

Unpaid Laborers Create a Scene and Troops Are Called Out.

TRENTON, N. J., Jan. 4.—A bad riot which occurred at Barnegat Park yesterday caused the governor to order the Camden battalion of the New Jersey militia put under arms to-day. The trouble was so vicious at midnight last night that Lieut. Farrow, U. S. A., fearing the place would be burned, made the requisition for troops.

Barnegat Park is the scheme of a number of army officers to build an all-the-year-round resort in the New Jersey pines, the residents to be army and navy officers. There are a number of valuable buildings in the place. A grand boulevard and an electric road are being constructed, and this work has kept a large force of Italians busy for some, from seventy-five to a hundred men being employed. They have had little or no money for three months and were getting the blues.

Ten days ago they struck, and a sheriff and posse have been on hand watching them. Their pay was to be forthcoming on Jan. 1, but it did not materialize, and the Italians proceeded to work themselves into a frenzy and threatened to kill Lieut. Farrow and others who were protecting the place. The sheriff and his posse were helpless, being largely outnumbered. The women were removed to the pines for safety, and all energy and persuasion were used to prevent the infuriated mob from burning the building.

The last resort was to call for troops. The sheriff got a large posse who were able to control the mob, and the governor ordered the troops who were being held in readiness mustered out. Lieut. Farrow expects to pay the men before the end of the week.

RAPID WORK.

A Hasty Marriage Almost Results in a Double Tragedy.

DENVER, Colo., Jan. 4.—The honeymoon of Banker Dow's son and Millie Price, the actress, who were married here Friday night, came near ending in a double murder to-night. Dow's father has refused to have anything to do with him or aid him financially. He was to have left here to-morrow morning with the company, and several creditors hearing of this had the young man arrested Saturday on a charge of obtaining goods under false pretenses. The trial was set for Wednesday, which made it necessary for him to remain behind, but he intended to join his wife and the company at Salt Lake City.

To-night the couple retired to their room at the Windsor hotel about 10 o'clock. Two hours later the door was thrown open and Mrs. Dow rushed down the hall clad in her night robe, screaming murder at the top of her voice. Several guests hurried into the hall just in time to see the husband emerge from his room and fire a shot from his revolver at his fleeing wife.

Seeing that he failed to hit her, he reentered his room and attempted to blow his brains out, but the bullet flew wide of its mark, and he was overpowered before he could make another attempt.

No one knows the cause of the trouble, but it was probably over money matters. This couple have beaten the record. They met for the first time on Thursday morning of this week, were married Friday morning and practically divorced on Sunday evening.

SAY HAS HIS SAY.

He Animadverts Upon the McKinley Bill and Farmers' Alliance.

PARIS, Jan. 4.—Leon Say, in an article in the Journal des Debats, severely criticises the McKinley tariff law and the American Farmers' Alliance. He declares that America, notwithstanding its immense wealth, cannot carry out its industrial, commercial or agricultural enterprises without European capital, and continues:

"The fact of the situation is that they have destroyed their credit by abusing it by maladministration of their transport enterprises and by their even worse administration of their local finances. Unless a reaction occurs in public morals American credit cannot recover from its abasement, and its agricultural, like its other industries, will remain a prey to successive convulsions, for which transient remedies will be sought by the adoption of experiments certain to fail, continually leading the country to graver crises. It is astonishing that in a country of business men they have brought themselves to believe that there are no limits to money circulation. If America turns its mines into coin and raises the paper currency in accordance with the ideas of the Farmers' Alliance, no agreement will be possible with Europe on the monetary question. Europe would be foolish to transfer its capital to America in exchange for an absolutely useless mass of silver."

Made a Great Mistake.

LOS ANGELES, Cal., Jan. 4.—Frank H. Mandeville stole into the room of Mrs. Millie Shaw, a dressmaker, last night. When Mrs. Shaw entered he fired three shots at her without effect and then shot himself dead. Mandeville was a representative of John Allison & Co., advertising agents of Chicago, and had served in the regular United States cavalry. He was about forty-two years of age. Mandeville had been paying attentions to Mrs. Shaw for some time, and was acquainted with her in the East. About a month ago h threatened to shoot her, and she ordered him not to call on her in future. Last evening was the first time she had seen him since then.

The Howard Lake Roller mill caught fire and is now in cinders, caused by a disconnected belt. Building, machinery and several hundred bushels of wheat are a total loss. The plant was valued at $18,000; insurance, $10,000. The mill was recently improved at a cost of $1,500, and was in readiness for a large winter business.

The remains of George Kane, who was killed by Marshal Booth at Hinckley on Christmas, were received at Hastings, accompanied by his brother John. Many citizens gathered at the depot. Michael Kane, a twin brother of the deceased, who was also shot by the marshal, is still lying at the hospital at Hinckley in a precarious condition. The age of the Kane boys was twenty-five years.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Baumgarten, who live a few miles northwest of Fergus Falls, drove in to attend the services in the German Lutheran church. They brought with them their three-months'-old baby, and wrapped it up very thoroughly to protect it from the cold. When they reached the church and unwrapped the child they were horrified to find that it was almost suffocated from its wraps, and it died in a few moments.

J. B. Metz, agent of the West Shore & Hoosac Tunnel line at Minneapolis, who left there mysteriously, has been quietly living at Butte, Montana. He is in excellent health mentally and physically, and the inference derived from his letter to his superior in St. Paul, W. F. Wilson, that he is crazy seems without foundation. He refuses to give any explanation of the cause of his sudden departure further than to intimate that he had got into a fast set and was getting too deep in the social swim.

Prof. A. C. Gutterson died at Owatonna after a short illness, aged sixty. He was born in Vermont and came to Owatonna in 1866. In 1867 he graduated from the Normal Musical Academy of the Northwest at Madison, and since had devoted much time to music. He composed the cantatas of "Christmas," "The Seasons" and numerous other pieces of church and secular music. He has been alderman and mayor of the city, and was treasurer of the state school board at the time of his death. He has been cashier of the Farmers' National bank since its organization in 1874.

NORTH DAKOTA.

The president signed the bill for the erection of a public building at Fargo.

This state ranks as the forty-first state in of point of population.

Edmund Hackett, Bismarck's first mayor, who lives in Seymour, Tex., has invented a machine that digs and sacks potatoes.

Ex-Gov. Pillsbury, of Minnesota, who has been traveling over the state, says: "Every farmer who sticks to his farm in this region will come out all right."

Nicholas Dahm stabbed and killed Pierre Dumas in a saloon at Neche. They quarreled about who should pay for the drinks. Dahm was arrested and hurried away to Pembina to prevent his lynching.

The state board of boiler inspectors has been meeting at Fargo, by comparing notes and putting in shape changes which they deem advisable to have made the coming season in the laws.

The Jamestown Alert says that Capt. Fetchet, of the Eight cavalry, who supported the Indian police in the capture of Sitting Bull, is the officer who was tried for knocking down and severely injuring a soldier at Bismarck on the 4th of July a year ago.

Traveling man in the Fargo Argus: Staples is getting to be a great town for sports. I was there recently and saw Johnny Fosdyke, of Jamestown, win $1,800 in about half on hour at "seven come 'leven." They were shooting $100 at a crack. He was singing "Down went McGinty" all the time and it seemed to bring him luck.

It appears that Bishop Walker, of this state, is not quite up to the times, notwithstanding his church-on-wheels revolution. The car has iron wheels and the Northern Pacific refuses to attach it to passenger trains. Therefore the bishop must travel by slow freight.

Some one figures that the wheat made into bread in the United States at Dakota prices costs $204,000,000—that is, 340,000,000 bushels at 60 cents per pushel—while the sugar consumed amounts to $300,000,000. From this it concludes that sugar costs more than bread, or about $4.40 per capita for sugar against $3.20 for bread.

The Fargo Argus has heard it said that Col. Plummer has been sent east to advertise this state in order to keep him from tampering with the legislature at Bismarck. The Argus says: "The colonel is a whole team and a horse to let—with a yaller dog under the wagon—so to speak, wherever he is put."

The Oakes Republican is responsible for the statement that in Sargent county Judge Lauder terminated the term of court rather earlier than was expected on account of "litigants being unable to meet court expenses as well as attorneys to work for windy promises." It is not thought that another term will be held until after next harvest.

Hon. James Mathews, of Larrimore, says he came to this state for his health. He has found it, his weight increasing from 136 to 170 pounds. Incidentally he has gathered up about 4,000 acres of land. He had 2,000 acres in crops this year, and sold his wheat at $1.25 per bushel. He has about 260 head of blooded horses that he has raised while he was resting.

Gerald Pierce, of Bismarck, sends the Fargo Argus a bottle of syrup made from sugar beets by a German woman living ten miles north of Bismarck. She has no machinery for its manufacture, and simply presses the beets and cooks the product. Th family raises enough beets every year to not only supply themselves with syrup, but to keep the neighborhood in the article.

The bill introduced by Representative Hansbrough to disarm all the Indians and punish severely any one selling arms and ammunition to them should pass. It is a grave evil that the best quality of arms and amunition should be found in abundance among these savages, who are liable at any day to use them upon the troops and settlers. No other nation in the world permits such armament of the wild and partially wild people in its territories.

Dickey county pluck is to be commended. A carload of flour was recently purchased by the charitable people of Fargo and consigned to "the destitute people of Dickey county. The commissioners of that county promptly and politely replied that they knew of no destitution that could not be relieved without outside aid. Almost every county in either of the Dakotas could make a similar report if commissioners would do their whole duty in looking up the poor who are too proud to ask for aid, and helping them to tide over the winter.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Huron boasts that it has more school children than any other town in this state—620.

A pair of moose are to be broken to harness in South Sioux Falls. It is expected to drive them in Sioux Falls until the opening of the world's fair, when they will be taken to Chicago.

Fifty or more of the mighty hunters of Pierre hunted the festive jack rabbit on Christmas day. One of them carried a Kodak camera and brought in a picture of a rabbit. The others got a cold dinner on their return, which they ate standing, not being used to horseback riding.

The Deadwood Pioneer says that Rapid City is as safe as New York city from Indian invasion, but that the "Indian war" is and has been a big thing for Rapid City and the farmers of Pennington and Custer counties. Farmers who have anything to sell get good prices, and everyone who has a team gets $6 per day for transportation of supplies, ordnance or some other traps belonging to the government.

WISCONSIN.

Gustav Kuentzel, the postmaster at Marion, Waupaca County, is $1,461 short in his accounts, and has given his bonds-men possession of his property to secure them.

The name of Mayor Bashford of Madison, was mentioned for assistant attorney-generalship, but the men who control these matters are said to have vetoed any such proceeding.

Jay Trumbull, the Merrillan agent of the American Express Company, was made a present of $70 because he was robbed of $1,000 a few weeks ago, Truly. corporations have souls.

William Smith happened to be on a St. Paul train near Racine Christmas Day. He reached up to pull the bell cord when Conductor Tilton felled him with a blow between the eyes.

Little James Scribner, of Rosendale, Green Lake County took a dynamite cartridge to school with him and endeavored to fit it over a pencil. Portions of the boy's hand were scattered about the room, and for a wonder he was not killed.

While endeavoring to arrest Rhode Capile and two unruly sons at Whitewater, an officer of that town performed an almost unparalleled feat. He shot Capile's son through the hand, hit the father in the jaw and also struck a bystander, all with the same bullet.

Joseph Gibson, of Neenah, sent his boy out with a pail to milk a cow twenty-nine years ago. The boy set the pail against the farm-yard fence and ran away. Last Christmas Day the boy returned home. The old man thought his boy dead, and the family is rejoicing. Young Gibson is now nearly 40, and has been around the world.

James Arthur, who was probably the biggest man in Wisconsin, died at Linden the other day on his immense farm. Arthur lacked only a fraction of being 7 feet in height, weighed 300 pounds when in ordinary good condition, and was perfectly developed. He was a veritable Samson in strength, and his feats were the talk of the surrounding country for miles.

IOWA.

As a result of the recent prosecution the saloons of Carroll have changed managers, but the schooners sail over the bars just the same.

Palo Alto county will this year market 50,000 tons of hay. Kossuth county, the Algona Courier says, will go her several thousand tons better.

Iowa county owns about 8,000 acres of land in Ida and Cherokee counties, valued at $15 per acre. It is all leased, and pays Iowa county a rental of $1,700 per year.

C. B. Paul, of Algona, has patented a device to warm a cold bed. The heat is generated by a common kerosene lamp and conveyed into the bed by means of a tin tube.

In South Ottumwa pretty young ladies pass the contribution boxes in the churches and the pastors' wives buy buttons for the use of the family, like the wives of other citizens.

The will of the late Mrs. Ogilby of Dubuque, makes a provisional bequest of $5,000 to an eastern home for superanuated Methodist ministers. Mrs. Ogilby's estate is worth $50,000 or $6,000.

The Northwood Index says: Jack rabbits are becoming rather more numerous than jack pots. A few years ago they—the rabbits—were so scarce as to be decided curiosities.

Manchester's water-works have been tested and work satisfactorily. Water is taken from a big spring, and in case of emergency from the Maquoketa river. Two 750,000 gallon Smedley pumps are used.

Cedar Rapids made about $600,000 worth of building improvements the past year, according to the big and handsome Christmas edition of the Gazette. A prosperous year in all kinds of business is also reported.

In Pocohontas county the newspapers advertise the sale of the poor farm. Counting interest on the plant and the cost of committee work to see that it is properly cared for the farm costs more than it comes to.

An Original Parrot.

There was of late advertised a parrot who could make original observations—not mere slavish "copy," but the most apt remarks. A parrot fancier answered the advertisement, and the advertiser brought his bird. He was not beautiful, and he did not look accomplished. He no sooner opened his mouth, however, than his genius discovered itself.

"Supposing that this bird is all that you say of it," inquired the possible purchaser, "what do you want for it?"

"Fifty pounds," said the dealer.

"Make it guineas!" exclaimed the parrot.

The enraptured bird-fancier bought him at once.

Weeks rolled on, and the bird never said another word. Not even that solitary sentence "Make it guineas," which the purchaser naturally thought he had learned by rote as was the case with that world-famous bird that cried, "what a precious lot of parrots!" on finding himself in a bird show, and for evermore held his peace. He sent for the dealer, and thus frankly addressed him:—

"Of course, I have been taken in. This infernal bird is dumb; can't even say, 'What's o'clock; or "Pretty Poll.'"

"He only professes to make original observations," put in the dealerr

"Nonsense! he does nothing but scratch himself. You have got you money; at least, tell me how he contrived to say, 'Make it guineas,' at so appropriate a moment. I'll forgive you if you only tell me the truth."

"Very good, sir. Then he didn't say it at all, I said it for him. I'm a ventriloquist. My parrots all make original observations, but only in my presence."

Then the parrot fancier shook hands with the dealer and gave him a list of other parrot fanciers (his personal friends), who also in due time were taken in, which, of course, was very soothing.

The Motion Denied.

The late Judge Blackman was very particular in requiring attorneys to observe the rules of practice. In a certain cause, says the Albany Law Journal, Lawyer T. had sued out a writ of capias. Lawyer L. moved to quash the writ, and was proceeding with his argument, when the court interrupted him with the following query: The Court—"What are you reading from, sir?" Lawyer L.—"Fom a work on logic, your honor." The Court—"Did you give Brother T. notice that you were going to read from a work on logic?" Lawyer L.—"Of course not, your honor." The Court—"Are you aware, sir, of the rule of court which requires notice to be given of matter which would be liable to surprise the attorney on the other side?" Lawyer L.—"Yes, your honor; but the rule has no application to a matter of this kind." The Court—"I don't know, sir; I don't know. I know of nothing that would surprise Brother T. more than logic, and if you haven't given notice that you are going to read from a work on logic, why, I can't permit you to read it." Lawyer L. proceeded with his argument, and presently he was again interrupted by the court. The Court—"What are you reading from now, sir?" Lawyer L.—"Green's grammar, your honor." The Court—"Did you give Brother T. notice that you were going to read from Green's grammer?" Lawyer L. (very testily)—"Of course not, your honor." The Court—"Well, sir, I know of nothing in this world, aside from logic, that would surprise Brother T. more than grammar, and if you haven't given him notice that you are going to read from Green's grammar, why, I can't permit you to read it, and I shall have to deny your motion with costs."

"Almost a Perfect Man."

A tall, thinnish man, with silky pale brown hair, worn long and put back behind his ears, the high tops of which bent forward a little under the weight, and thus took on the most remarkable air of paying incessant attention to everybody and everything; set far out in front of these ears as though it did not wish to be disturbed by what was heard a white, wind-splitting face, calm, beardless and seeming never to have been cold, or to have dropped the kindly dew of perspiration; under the serene peak of his forehead a pair of larg gray eyes, patient and dreamy, being habitually turned inward upon a mind toiling with hard abstractions; having within him a conscience burning always like a planet; a bachelor—being a logician; therefore sweet-tempered, never having sipped the sour cup of experience; gazing covertly at womankind from behind the delicate veil of unfamiliarity that lends enchantment; being a bachelor and a bookworm, therefore, already old at 40, and a little run down in his toilets, a little frayed out at the elbows and knees, a little seamy along the back, a little deficient at the heels; in pocket poor always, and always the poorer because of a spendthrift habit in the matter of secret charities; kneeling down by the small, hard bed every morning and praying that during the day his logical faculty might discharge its function logically, and that over all the operations of all his other faculties he might find heavenly grace to exercise both a logical and a moral control; at night kneeling down again to ask forgivenss that, despite his prayer of the morning, one or more of these same faculties—he knew them all familiarly by name, being a metaphysician—had gone wrong in a manner the most abnormal, shameless and unforseen. Thus, on the whole, a man shy and dry, gentle, loveable, timid, resolute, forgetful, remorseful, eccentric, impulsive, thinking two well of every human creature but himself; an illogical logician, an erring moralist, a wool-gathering philosopher, but, humanly speaking, almost a perfect man.—Harper's Magazine.

Facts Concerning Wolves.

Temple Bar.

The natural enmity which subsists between dogs and wolves is a characteristic which is recalled by the antipathy shown by every good watchdog toward strangers of his own race; but that wolves should devour dogs certainly savours somewhat of cannibalism, for these friends and foes of man are in faet two branches of the same family, as is proved to the satisfaction of naturalists by their identity in various important characteristics, though sundry minor points of difference are noted, such as that in drinking a dog laps, whereas a wolf sucks, and in biting the wolf gives a rapid succession of vicious snaps, instead of the firm retaining hold which generally characterizes the bite of a healthy dog. The character of the bark also differs greatly, the honest dog-bark being replaced by a short snapping, while the wolf voice is chiefly exerted in producing dismal howls.

As regards external appearance, the common wolf with his shaggy cout bears a much close resemblance to a Collie dog than the latter does to most other branches of the dog tribe, though the cruel, treacherous expression of the obliquely-set eyes betrays how different is the wolf-spirit from that which looks out through the kind true eyes of the faithful dog. Yet there have been instances of domesticated wolves which have formed a strong attachment to their human owners, while on the other hand we have to confess that the dog race does include both savage and cowardlp individuals,

The Dear, Sweet Thing!

In a close-fitting tailor-made dress, and a light-colored cape of Persian lamb, she appeared before the stall-keepers at Washington Market. She carried a Russian leather note-book with a gold pencil, and the most artistic little willow basket imaginable.

"Oh, the dear little piggies," she exclaimed, walking up to where a number of pigs were incarcerated. "How much are they a pair?"

"Eight and a half, mum," said the butcher.

"Isn't that pretty dear?" she asked timidly.

"I guess I'll take some oysters instead," she said, walking over to where the men were busy opening the emblems of silence. "I want some oysters sent up; escalloped oysters," she said, "with plenty of raisins in them."

"Oh, those lovely purple pumpkins," she said, walking over to a stand where a lot of Edam cheese was displayed

"I'll take four of these. I know it's plebian, but Reginald does like pumpkin pies."

"Are all hams yellow like these?" she asked, pointing to a counter-full.

"No, Miss; that's only the cover," said the man in charge.

"Those lovely pink onions will just match my china. How do you sell them a dozen?"

"Seventy-five cents a bushel," said the huckster. "Send me up two bushels," she said.—From the New York Times.

CREOLE AND PURITAN

By T. C. DE LEON,

knows I have not deserved all you say!"

She turned away, paused and raised her hand, half in warning, half in menace.

"I confided in your honor, only to lessen a blow to you," she said coldly. "Now I forbid you to breathe—so long as we both shall live—one word of what has passed!"

On the very threshold she turned again, red disks glowing in her cheeks, her eyes full on the wondering ones of her lover. But dead white lips formed the words:

"Remember! I trusted to your honor!"

PART I—CHAPTER VI.

VIVIEN.

Edith stood suddenly before him.

Dale Everett stood where she left him, thought bound. The little French clock ticked the endless message of time, the Nemesis, but the throbbing of his own heart and the echo of the girl's challenge were the only sounds he heard.

Far less rapt he might well have missed the softest rustle of skirts, the lightest sound of French slippers on the porch, as Edith Van der Huysen stepped from it to the grass plot and passed rapidly into the shrubbery.

Yet had Dale that moment seen her face he might have thought a specter had crossed the path before her, not that chance had brought her from her room for a quiet stroll among the roses; for its glowing olive was ashen dull, and the hinted veins beneath now stood out strong on throat and temple. The red lips closed in straight and cruel line that sent the blood all out of them, and the brown eyes gleamed black as night with evil, dangerous light.

But with firm step and figure erect the woman walked away, and the blood brought the olive to her face once more as the lips curled into a bitter smile and finally parted laughing as she said aloud:

"Edith Van der Huysen, can you really be a fool? Your place is in court, not camp. And surely you are old enough to give up playthings. If not, my lord is toy enough."

And again the low laugh came, with a tinge of humor in it; the eyes grew lighter, and the tall form fell into its sinuous grace, as the gravel crunched and Adrien Latour came swiftly up the walk

Parting the shrubbery Edith stood suddenly before him, a glowing picture in the great Gainsborough hat, with her old smile on her lips.

"Welcome, Sir Laggard!" she said extending her ungloved hand. "As you could never be 'a dastard in war,' you are yet in time."

"And as you can never be less a riddle, you read one again," the Creole answered, only half hiding a look of disappointment as he took the hand she offered. "Will you explain this one, or is it shut in your book?"

Edith following his glance realized for the first time that she had seized a book as she hastily left her room. It chanced to be Bennie's Tennyson; and her smile grew deeper as her eyes darkened once more.

"Si non e vero e ben trovato," she answered laughing, holding the title before his eyes. "We used to talk of this in West Point days, Mr. Latour; and Merlin still works his marvels for Launcelot as well as for Arthur."

"You are incomprehensible," he answered, as he turned to walk with her. "I never did understand you, though."

"Not altogether," she retorted, demurely, not meeting his eye. "But you don't understand Old Merlin either. He is still at work, even if he does not take Vivien into his secret this time. How if he should make a charm of golden philtre and diamond drops to change Elaine into Guinevere, even to the sore discomfiture of Launcelot and to the undoing of the Pure King, at once?"

"Your riddle is still unread," the man answered, restlessly. "I do not understand you, Miss Edith."

"So you just told me," she laughed back. "For in the legend Elaine cared nothing for the great diamonds of the Last Tournament: and even Guinevere hurled them in contempt before the bier of the dead Purity."

"Miss Edith, you certainly mean something"—— Latour began, but she finished for him:

"What society girl's nonsense ever means anything? Poetry is only in books nowadays, and love philtres are all dried up—even if diamonds still be prizes to win! But I must not detain you today, of all days. You are looked for at the house; so, au revoir!"

"Not until you explain," he answered, chafing under her badinage.

"What?" She looked wonderingly into his eyes, her own seeming as dark. "Would Launcelot have dallied for silly legends and left the lists vacant, while the diamonds still hung as the prize? Then who would have ridden for Elaine—when she was changed to Guinevere?"

"Ask herself, who never weaves riddles and who is not run away with by legends." And Miss Van der Huysen laughed innocently, her bright face glowing in strange contrast to its mask so lately put off.

"But you did mean her once, when you spoke of Elaine," he insisted, awkwardly. "And if I be Launcelot——"

"Then can you never be —— Tristram," she finished for him, with another little laugh. "But you must go, else Aunt Tab will be scolding us both; so, au revoir!"

"And you will not explain?"

"Nothing explains nothing," she answered, lightly. "Why, were I crafty as Vivien, there be strange secrets still beyond 'the spell of woven paces and of waving hands.' And besides" — she paused an instant, looking at him with innocent eyes—"even Vivien never spake word to lower the Lily Maid before the godlike king—or Launcelot!"

And with a pretty but decided gesture Miss Van der Huysen turned away, and the Creole, with puzzled face, moved rapidly toward the house once more.

"Vivien!" repeated the woman aloud. Her face was turned toward the distant mountains, which she did not see, for again the darker glow crept into the brown eyes. "Vivien! What, after all, was she? A woman!"

But when Edith Van der Huysen entered Bennie's room a few moments later and remarked casually that she had been for a little turn in the garden she had the same quiet smile in those eyes with which she had left it.

Not so the bride to be. Her cheeks were hot and flushed, her eyelids heavy with recent weeping. The pride and womanhood, the underrated strength of the sex which makes them martyrs if need be, break down all the more helplessly after strongest occasion for their exercise.

On leaving Dale Everett the girl ran to her room, locked the door and threw herself prone upon the sofa, the fair round arms clasping the hard, gold embroidered cushion against her face. Forgetting the flight of time, the ceremony to come, she abandoned herself to a gush of grief, remorse and self contempt that shook her as a strong ague.

But youth is elastic, and few griefs kill. Gradually the sobs came less frequently, then ceased, and the girl lay quite motionless a while. What thoughts crowded one another out of place in her mind, in all those unnoted minutes, she herself could not have told. But at last she rose listlessly, pushed the damp hair away from her face in a weary, dazed manner, and showing strangely little on the pale but quiet features of the mental storm that had passed over her. Turning to her dainty dressing table, she rested her chin upon her hands and looked steadily at her reflected face as if to question whatever resolve the struggle had brought forth. Then she quietly opened her writing desk and took from a drawer two photographs, a note dusty with dried flowers, a much monogramed class card, and the inevitable button and loop of blue ribbon, ever trophied with the victims and the victors alike of the summer tilts "around Flirtation." Listlessly turning them over, a faded rosebud fell from an envelope, breaking from the stem and scattering dead leaves and dust upon the desk. A strange smile twisted the girl's lips as she slowly picked them up, dropping them one by one back into the envelope.

"I have made my own fate," she said aloud, as if to the superscription in Adrien's bold, free hand. "Having made it, I will meet it like as true a woman as I may. In a few hours I shall be a wife. These are the toys of childhood; they are mine no more. Only a future is mine—no past. Among them they have killed that!"

Still moving quietly, with no cloud on her face, without even a sigh, Bennie Standish piled the papers and the flowers in the empty hearth, touched a match to them, and calmly watched while they curled into gray ash, blackening as it cooled.

Then she turned to the desk again, chose a tiny sheet of paper, and wrote—almost automatically—these words:

> God pardons our sins. Surely he forgives our errors. He will pity the child, forced into a marriage without love; will right the wrong thus done others—and herself! On your honor, remember! Adrien must never know the love for him that forces these last words ever to be signed
>
> BENNIE STANDISH.

Folding the sheet several times she slipped it in the smallest envelope and sealed it with steady fingers. Then, still holding it in her hands, she knelt by the bedside and bowed her head in silent prayer. Long she knelt; and the sun, passing westward on his way to night, looked into the window near and sent his golden light around the golden hair, like a halo.

When Bennie Standish rose from her knees only the red rimmed eyelids told of the storm passed by. Paler than its wont, her face was quiet, even gentle. Not one tremor showed in the hands that quietly took out the simple, tasteful traveling dress and dainty bonnet and laid them on the bed, ready for the bridal toilet. This she began by dropping the masses of shining hair about her shoulders and passing again to the mirror.

Pushing the hair back from her temples with both hands, the girl looked steadily once more into her reflected eyes. It was a long, searching look, but the eyes she gazed into never shunned it; and at last—with a deep breath, that was not a sigh—she said to the reflected self:

"No! I have not sinned! God grant I have not erred too deeply! This is the end of the child; may he guide the woman!"

Hearing Edith's step as she spoke these words, Bennie turned quietly and unlocked the always open door. The other girl paused as she entered, and looked at her strangely.

"Why, Bennie dear, what is the matter? You seem really woebegone. These are not the looks for a bride elect! You bring back wicked old John Suckling's song:

> Why so wan and pale, young lover
> Prithee, why so pale?
> Will, when looking well can't move her,
> Looking ill prevail?
> Prithee, why so pale?

"Do not jest, Edith," Bennie answered gravely. "It is no trifling step I am about to take. Can you wonder that the responsibility weighs on me? It is grave—awful!"

"But you never so looked at it before," Miss Van der Huysen answered quietly. "And you surely have had time to think of all this."

"I was never so near it then," Bennie answered gravely, but still calmly. "It never seemed so real before."

"Scarcely flattering to the groom to be," Edith retorted with a dry little laugh. "But then he will never know, dear; so go on with your dressing like a good child. Before I begin my own war paint, can I do anything?"

"Nothing! Oh, yes; you can give"—— Bennie put her hand to her bosom, touched the note hidden there, and stopped suddenly, looking straight into Miss Van der Huysen's quiet brown eyes with trusting blue ones. "Edith, I believe you love me—no, don't interrupt me! I know you do. And I trust you implicitly. I believe you can trust me without a word of explanation. Here! When we are gone—not before, remember; but after we leave Rose villa tonight—give this to Dale Everett. Give it when no one is by to see. Don't ask me anything, please! It is a simple little note; only a word of farewell, and a little request."

Edith Van der Huysen's eyes darkened, but the voice was sweetly low that answered:

"Certainly, dear; Dale shall have it, as you ask. And why should I ask any questions? But have you nothing to give—no word even—for Adrien?"

"Nothing," Bennie answered simply.

Edith took the little envelope, but never moved her quiet, darkened eyes from Bennie's face as the latter crossed to the bell.

"I'll ring for Marie to dress me now; it is really late," she said listlessly, showing none of that excitement presumed by the inexpert to belong to preparations on the feminine side for the great event of life.

"Can I do nothing more?" Edith asked, still lingering. "Then I, too, must go and prepare for the—sacrifice!"

The word fell slowly from her lips; but, if meant for a cue, Bennie did not pick it up. She only said gently:

"I did not call it that, dear. Now kiss me and go dress."

Miss Van der Huysen kissed her friend on the cheek—one of those feminine kisses that may mean a whole world of affection yet would differ nothing in outward show did it carry poison to the lips of an inconvenient rival. Then she crossed the hall to her own apartment, holding the little letter in her hand. But as she went she turned it over nervously, as though it were hot and burned her fingers.

In her own room she, too, turned the rarely used key, threw herself into an armchair and leaned back with half closed eyes; but through the lashes gleamed the dark light of busy thought. Twice she raised the little envelope, staring hard at it then, as if she had settled her point, tossed it on the bed and went methodically about her toilet.

Half undressed she paused abruptly and again took up the note, turning it over in her hands; the glory of her splendid hair rippling far down the gleaming satin of bare, sleek shoulders and slim, rounded arms, model for a Venus, framing the rich face, through whose flushed olive burned eyes of fiery blackness.

"Dale Everett!" she said in a hard, bitter voice the world never heard. "Poor child! she'd have me think 'tis he! I was never so near such a mistake before. But, if she spoke truth to Dale, why should her last words be to him? But now I know 'the charm of woven paces and of waving hands!' What is the worth of knowing, though?"

She stood erect, the light, soft drapery emphasizing her perfection of curve and dark feature. With eyes gleaming into space she raised her hand in menacing gesture, defiant, uncanny, suggestive of a Pythoness in pose and in regard. As she stood thus wheels ground the gravel on the drive below; a carriage rolled to the door and stopped. With a start Edith came back to herself and to the present. She shot a quick glance through the blinds just as a dignified, well preserved man alighted and turned to assist a stylish girl and the venerable bishop of the diocese.

Edith's red lips parted in a strange laugh as she turned once more to her toilet.

"The Minotaur is ready," she said. "And the Sacrifice? Her last word—her last thought—is for another. 'Tis well to be off with the old love!' Bah! and she thinks to blind me!" Again the low laugh came, unmerry, threatening. "When Vivien had gained the charm she cried, 'Oh, fool!' and all the forest echoed, 'Fool!'— And now to dress!"

PART I—CHAPTER VII.

"SOME AT THE BRIDAL; SOME AT"——

Touched his lips to her forehead.

Dale Everett sat in the empty parlor, his eyes fixed vacantly on the distant foot hills. He did not even think, so stunning was the sudden revelation to him of this girl he had loved so well. Neither did he hear Latour's quick step upon the turf; but he scarcely started at the hand on his shoulder and the cheery voice at his ear:

"Deuced strange, Dale, but I haven't —Eh! you have seen her!"

Latour finished abruptly as the other raised his eyes. Something in them spoke more than words, as Dale rose to his feet; for the men stood with clasped hands, silent, while the little clock ticked tediously through many seconds. The Creole spoke first.

"You will believe me, dear old boy," he said, "when I tell you I am sorry for this. You are a better man than I am, Dale; and she might have been happier with you. But if she won't have the worthy fellow she may the worthless; so my turn comes!"

There was not one taint of selfishness in the sorrow that spoke through Dale Everett's eyes. How could he break the news he had to tell?—news his friend would receive so differently from him. But it must be; so he said, very gravely:

"Neither of us has his turn, old friend. You nor I can ever speak of love to Bennie Standish."

"What do you mean?" cried Latour. "Did she tell you she would not marry me?"

"She did not. But—be a man and bear the blow, as I did—she marries Beverly Mason this very day!"

The Creole staggered back, as if his friend had struck him. Then he strode to the window. When he turned he said hoarsely:

"Who told you? It is some lie!"

Again Latour turned quickly to the window, without word of reply; but his friend saw the hand that rested against the frame close on it with such grip that the nails grew white.

Equally bitter, perhaps, was the struggle in the hearts of both men. Adrien's sensitive nature was perhaps more shocked by its suddenness, but indomitable pride and stubborn will strove to hide it even from his friend. Dale Everett was torn by doubt whether to disregard the woman's injunction, violate his own implied pledge and betray her secret. He knew Adrien so thoroughly that he was sure a hint of the truth would send him to her, to make one effort for the happiness of both, were she at the steps of the altar. Twice his lips formed the words that would have forced the girl at least to pause before her awful step was taken for life, and twice the words were pushed back into his throat by the echo of her voice repeating:

"Remember, I trusted to your honor!"

Adrien Latour turned abruptly from the window, strode to his friend and placed a hand heavily upon his shoulder. The dark face had grown darker, and the voice was cold and cruel; yet he turned aside his head as he said:

"So! She sells herself as I would not sell one of my slaves! A woman like this has no heart—no self respect! Here is my hand on it; from this hour we despise her!"

But Dale drew back. The stern manhood in him would not do injustice even to the woman whose act he condemned so bitterly.

"Wait!" he said gravely. "We cannot always read the working of human hearts. Remember the divine injunction, 'Judge not, that ye be not judged!'"

Even as he spoke Miss Tabitha's note was heard in the hall, as she returned to the charge. She entered the room with a flurry of words, plunged at once into many and complex explanations, and, with much show of mystery, told the secret that was none to them, and assigned their places at the coming ceremonial.

The painful absurdity of the situation was broken by the groom's arrival and the introductions to his party. Mr. Mason proved to be a dignified and courtly man of the world, wearing his half century lightly, but adopting none of the nonsense of the old beau. His manner in the trying ordeal was quite perfect—self contained and deferential to the spinster, frank and cordial to both young men.

The latter bore the meeting each in his own way, for if there be truth in wine the stimulant of suffering also brings from its hidden places the reality of our nature. Adrien passed through the introduction with such ceremonious courtesy that only his inborn grace saved it from being the reverse. Dale let his clear gray eyes rest full on Mr. Mason's face, as though studying the man beneath it, while he shook his hand frankly and said:

"I offer you no congratulations, sir. In presence of a joy so supreme as yours must be mere words would seem either flat or intrusive. But I have known her ever since we were children, and God has not made many like her!"

Adrien heard the words with darken-

Red River Valley.

Among the streams, large or small, sluggish or swift, that the net work of the river system of the globe, there are few that run in a northerly directon. Usually from their sources among the snows the mountain ranges, they infiltrate, flow and grow towards warmer waters. In colder and higher latitudes, evaporation is checked and rainfall less excessive than in those nearer the equatorial line, consequently the same flowing outlets are not necessary. Though the Red river of the North will not compare in size with the Amazon, St. Lawrence or Mississippi, yet it is a stream having individual peculiarities and unique features of its own, making it specially qualified to perform the office of a large drainage vein passing almost due north through this singularly fertile region. Rising within five miles of the source of one of the chief tributaries among the high waters of the Mississippi, it doubles, curves and winds upon itself persistently, at times describing so great an arc of a circle, that north, south and west, its wooded banks can be seen at the same time. It forms the boundary line for about half the distance between Minnesota and Dakota, and from the Canadian line it runs almost due north until it reaches Lake Winnipeg in Manitoda. It is fed by numerous small streams, the principal of which, the Red Lake River, drains the great pine timber region Northern Minensota, uniting on the border with the turbid, greenish waters of the Red in its swift, deep, headlong current. The lesser streams are nourished by still smaller branches, and between these are numerous sloughs or coulies, as they are locally called, which form perfect drainage for the vaste and nearly level valley. Nearly all the larger streams are heavily wooded along their banks. The valley proper is an apparently level prairie, sloping almost imperceptibly towards the river. In places, especially on the west, the boundary of the valley is marked by abrupt rising, and a sudden changing from flat to undulating surface.

Like many individuals of modest pretensions this river has a noted aucestry. This ribbon-like, meandering stream is all that is left of the mighty waters of the ancient sea whose waves once beat and rolled over the praries from Lake Winnepig to Lake Traverse. The sudden rise in the south and west are the beaches of this inland sea. A subsidence of the northern part of the continent turned the flow from this inter-ocean lake of the north, forcing the pent up waters to escape through channels into Hudson Bay. This ancient lake bed is now the splendid wheat fields of this land of the golden grain. Its soil is the rich washings of centuries, the crumbling of rocks brought by the glaciers of ages past. The drift, fine particles of soil and decaying vegtation from the shores were precipitated in the lake waters, where they settled to the bottom. Added to this was the natural sediment of the lake itself, the death ot innumerable fish and multitudes of water animals giving an animal as well as vegetable fertiiiziton. This process going on for ages has given the rich, fine, girtless soil of remarkable depth and unparalleled fertility covering the extensive prairie pasture land of the North west. It is a rich dark loam from eighteen inches to several feet deep, resting upon a very deep clay subsoil. Since the waters subsided, century upon century of summers the plains have bloomed in a wild luxuriance grasses. Each season they have withered, giving back the constituents of which they were composed, springing and rolling until the ground needs but to be overturned and exposed to the genial influences of light, heat and showers to yield harvests such as no other valles on earth can surpass.

Pronounced Hopeless, Yet Saved.

From a letter written by Mrs. Ada E Hurd of Groton, S. D., we quote: "Was taken with a bad cold, which settled on my Lungs, cough set in and finally terminated in Consumption. Four doctors gave me up saying I could live but a short time. I gave myself up to my Savior, determined if I could not stay with my friends on earth, I would meet my absent ones above. My husband was advised to get Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs and Colds. I gave it a trial, took in all eight bottles: it has cured me and thank God I am now a well and hearty woman." Trial bottles free at Schreiter's drugstore.

Chippewas Dancing

THIEF RIVER FALLS, Jan 20.—Great excitement prevails here over the repor that the Chippewas on the Red Lake reservation are making preparations for au out break. The excitment is mostly among the farmers and many of them are leaving for a slare of safety.

Saturday an Indian seen by an interpreter said that the Indians were preparing for a big dance, to take place Thursday of this week. He saib there would de plenty of Indians from diferent different parts of the reservation to take part, and that the pow-wow was to take place at Oak Grove, about eight miles northeast of this place. Through the dance was reported by him as a medicine dance, things look rabher suspicious. This is the first time in the memory of the seftler that the Indians have made any preparations for a medicine or any other dance during nie winer mnnths.

Twelve Sioux bucks are reported to have crossed the Red river last week on the way to the Red Lake reservation. The peopel of this section are in a precarious condition shouly any attempt at out break be made. The Indians are all. Steps well be taken towards procuring arms and ammunition at once.

Sundry Jottings

From the East Grand Forks Courier.

Red Lake Falls citizens, who are deeply interested in the project to divide Plk county into four counties, have held several meetidgs to put the ball in motion. Missrs. J.T. Knight and Jos. Smith have been appointed delegates to go to St. Paul in the intrest of diaision, and citizens of that town have virtually pledged $1000 toward defraying expenses and will raise as much more if necessary Committees have also been appointed to ciculate petitions among the farmer, asking their co-opertion.

As an example of what industry and pure grit will accomplish in this country the COURIER takes pride in pointing to Mr. Frederick Dangerfield, a well known farmer residing six miles north of this city on the Morais. Mr. Dangerfield came here from Canada about ten years ago, where through unfortunate speculations he lost a handsome fortune. Upon his arrival he had less than a hundred dollars. Today he is easily worth thirty thousand dollars, made principally by farming, sud shrewd land speculations. He has not only carved out this handsome competency unaided and alone, but he has provided generously for a large family, and is now engaged in the laucable work of seeing his sons comfortable settled. In the near future Mr. and Mrs. Dannerfield, his estimable wife, will move to this city to reside permanently, where every wise and taste they may have can be gratified. Mr. Dangerfield is so arranging his vast landed interests that he can direct the varied operations from his home soon to be established in this city the COURIER welcomes Mr. and Mrs. Dangerfield to the fold.

A Winter Paradise.

Our English word "paradise" comes from the Greek PARADESIOS, the primary signification of which is a pleasure park, such as was attached to the residences of monarchs, in which rare animals were gathered from strange lands, and in which also beasts were preserved for the chase. In this meaning of the word, the southern portion of the United States, particularly the states bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, may fairly be called a winter paradise, While the residents of the upper Mississippi Valley are in the midst of snow and ice, and buffeted by winter storms, the pleasant cities and towns of Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia and Florida are embosomed in green trees and blooming flowera, while breezes from the salt sea and the pine woods alternate in giving health and enjoyment to the dweller there. The favorite line, giving choice of routes via either Chicago or St Louis, for visitors from the Northwest to Southern resorts, is "The Burlington." About Printers' Ink.

This is the day of printers' ink, and the prize are for those who use it. Your traditions and prejudices may be to the contrary, but the world doesn't care a fig for them. The man who sits and waits for his trade in these days gets left Don't quote your price lists, don't see that your city or your business is represanted in your patronizing territory, and don't stand up manfully alongside of those who are fighting for your rights and interests, and there can be but one result —shriveling up. Good salesmen, first class articles, gilt edged credit are not enough. They are excellent, necessary —but not enough. Printers' ink beats them in the long run.

Uncle Sams mails go every day, carrying their freight of special offers, new crops, long credits, cash discounts, job lots and lovers' tales from everywhere. And in the end your trade is seduced. It's the world-old story of the honeyed tongue and the open ear. In the fierce competition of these daps old habits and and associations simply cannot stand the pressdre. The trade is for the man who uses printer's ink.

THE SUNNY SIDE.

Happiness comes from the inside and works out. There are no more happy people among the rich than among the poor, and there is no excuse for chronic grumblers. Men and women can make themselves unhappy, or they can see the sunny side of things, as they choose. This is a great age to live in, but young people who do not appreciate their opportunities, and commence life as grumblers, will be very apt to have a rocky time of it while they stay on earth, with little hope of getting over the habit of being unhappy in the next world.

WHAT BOYS SHOULD DO.

Horace Mann gives this bit of advice to boys: "You are made to be kind, boys: generous, magnanimous. If there is a boy in school who has a club foot, don't let you know you ever saw it. If there is a boy with ragged clothes, don't talk about rags in his hearing. If there is a lame boy, assign him some part of the game that doesn't require running. If there is a hungry one give a part of your dinner. If there is a dull one, help him to get his lessons. If there is a bright one, be not envious of him: for if one boy is proud of his talents, and another is envious of them, there are two great wrongs and no more talent than before. If a larger or stronger boy has injured you, and is sorry for it, forgive him. All the school will show by their countenance how much better it is than to have a great fuss. And remember who said: "Love your enemies," and 'Bless them which curse you.'"

PERSIST IN ONE CALLING.

Men who make great, or evan a moderate success in life, must have decision enough to stick to a chosen calling long enough to earn success. Those who are continually changing throw away the fruit of experience, and life is too short to waste any part of it. The first steps are always slow and toilsome, and it requires patience to gain dy dollars instead of by hundreds; but any gain is full of promise, as accumulations carefully made, whether of money, skill or knowledge, grow like the snow ball rolled up by a school boy, slowly at first, but more and more rapidly at each revoluton, until the ponderous mass is the admiration of the whole school. Those who begin at this and than at that, persisting at no one thing, accomplish nothing. Such persons imagine that if they had only been in the place of successful men, they would have made fortunes like them, when the fact is that they carried with them the seeds of failure, and wonld not have made a success under any circumstances.

TAXATION OF MORTGAGES.

There is one reform which has been promised to debt ridden people which desirable as it is, will be a very difficult matter to arrive at. Now real estate is is taxed, and no reduction is made for mortgage indebtedness on it. It has been a favorite idea of reformers, to tax the owner of real estate for its assessed value, less the mortgage, and to tax the owner of the mortgage at the place where it is recorded. The justice of this plan is conceded, but as mortgages are generally owned by non-residents, and as the laws of all states regard notes, secured or unsecured, as personal property, taxable in the township where the owner resides, he would thus be compelled, if honest, to pay a double tax, and the result would, of course, be that he would compel the borrower to pay the tax in addition to interest, or would do, what he has a perfect right to do, take his money to loan to some other State. The proposed reform is intended to benefit the borrower who needs all the benefits he can get, but the result would probably be greater difficulty in making loans and a higher rate of interest. The legislation which most helps the borrower, in the long run, is that which makes the collection of a debt simple and certain and which gives the least opportunity for a dishonest debtor to avoid complying with his contract. Money goes to the best market, and there it brings the lowest rate. And legislation, which on the face of it is intended to aid the borrower, often results in higher rates of interest.

A number of young people called at Mr. and Mrs. Moss Verboncouer's Saturday night to spend the evening. Mr. and Mrs. Verboncouer proved successful entertainers and jovially resigned proprietorship of their dwelling for the time being, and turned the rooms into a dance hall.

SINGLE TAX DEPARTMENT.

THE FARMER AND THE SINGLE TAX.

It is a favorite notion of the pro-poverty press and platform that the land value tax will never be accepted by farmers or small home owners. If that tax were what its ignorant opponents describe it these classes would be hostile; but when the farmer and rural home owner learn what the tax is, as those of New York State will in the political campaign this fall, they will be even more eager to adopt it than the artisan classes of the city have been.

W. T. Hopkins, of Enterprise, Kan., forwards a clipping from a paper of his State which gives a fair idea of the way the land value tax is misrepresented to farmers. After a long statement of what he supposes the land value tax to be and how it would affect the interests of farmers, the editor says: "This is a plain and simple statement of the Georgian land tax theory, put in the vernacular of the common people." It would be better English and nearer the truth to say that it is a statement of the Georgian land tax theory, put into the vernacular of an ignorant editor.

According to this Kansas quill, "under the George regime, the lawyer, the doctor, the merchant, the manufacturer—men of every trade and profession who own no land and who only represent billions of dollars' worth of personal property—will escape all taxation, and the whole burden will be thrown upon the farmer and home owner, except where business men carry on enterprises in their own stores and mills." There is more ignorance to the thousand ems in this quotation than there are puns in the funniest of Tom Hood's jingles.

Until we raise up a class of lawyers, doctors, merchants and manufacturers who can live without land, we shall have no man of either class who, under the land value tax, can escape his share of public burdens. They all pay a land value tax now and to the full annual value of the land they use; but it goes into the pockets of landlords instead of going into the public treasury.

This Kansas editor seems to think that a man who did not own the land he used would be untaxed. It is true he would not pay any more for the land than he pays now, but he now pays all he ought to pay. The trouble is that he pays the wrong man. He would pay no less under a land value tax except as the land he used fell in value, but so long as that land had a value he could not escape taxation. And he ought not to pay for any thing but the land value he appropriates. That, and that alone, of his wealth is produced by the community, and belongs to the community; his personal property and land improvements being of his own production, the community has no right to take them. When the community compels him to pay for the land value he appropriates it takes only what belongs to it; but when it compels him to give up to it of the products of his labor one penny over and above the land value he has appropriated it robs him.

It is not true, however, that lawyers, merchants, manufacturers and doctors represent billions of dollars' worth of personal property. What the astute Kansas editor means by personal property may be itemized as railroad stock, corporation and government bonds, and so on. Of the value of this class of property, very little is a property value at all. So much of corporation stock and bonds as represents actual labor products, like rolling stock, rails and stations, is property value, and ought to be free of taxes; first, because the community did not produce these things, and second, to encourage the production of more. But so much of such stock and bonds as represents special privileges and "water" is a mere device of robbery, bearing a relation to the industry of our time similar to what pirate ships bore to commerce a few generations ago.

When we propose to exempt labor products from taxation, we mean labor products. As for public franchises that are special privileges, we would abolish them altogether.

And how about the whole burden of taxation being thrown upon the farmer and home owner?

The Kansas editor will certainly exclude tenant farmers. It is strange that he does not classify tenant farmers with "men of every trade and profession who own no land;" for surely if doctors are to escape taxation tenant farmers will too. The truth is that tenant farmers, like doctors, will pay the same ground tax that they do now, except as it falls in consequence of the fall of land values, and that what they pay will find its way into the public treasury instead of settling, as it does now, in the coffers of landlords.

And why does not the Kansas editor classify mortgaged farmers with doctors, lawyers and merchants? The mortgaged farmer is to the extent of his mortgage, a tenant farmer.

That the whole burden of taxation will be thrown upon farm owners and home owners is false upon the face of it. How about mine owners? How about factory owners? How about store owners? How about water front owners? How about the owners of vacant lots?

The burden of taxation that farmers will have to bear will depend, like that of the home owner, on the value of the bare land they appropriate. Farmers are now taxed on the value of their land, their buildings, their fences, their drainage, their stock and their produce. Let our brilliant Kansas editor submit to the farmers of his acquaintance the alternative of a tax on all these values or on the value of the land alone, and see which they will chose.

When the average working farmer appraises the value of his buildings, fences, drainage, stock and produce in one class and the value of his bare land in another, he will find that the totals are about as four to one. The total of the first class it is proposed to exempt; but under the present system the total of both classes is taxed.

And this is not all. When taxes are imposed solely on land values, so much land that is now held out of use for speculation will seek a market that the value of all land will fall; and as it falls the farmers' tax will recede. It is probable, if the speculative value of land were eliminated, as it would be under the land value tax, that the value of the average working farmers' improvements, stock and produce, compared to the value of his bare land, would be as ten to one. In many cases it would be as the whole is to nothing.

Home owners and farmers now bear the burden of taxes, and the land value tax would emancipate them. When we consider the special privileges that the wealthy classes enjoy, their taxes are exceedingly light compared to those of the house owner and the farmer, whose special privileges are meager. The only special privilege that the average home owner and working farmer enjoys is the exclusive right to a piece of land, the value of which relatively to the value of the wealth he produces is a trifle; but there are mine owners, city lot owners, railroad owners, telegraph owners and currency makers whose special privileges relatively to the wealth they produce are in value close on to a hundred times. Owners of coal mines, for example, get thirty-five cents a ton for all coal mined; how much wealth do they produce? None. Under the land value tax, which bears only upon special privileges, they, and such as they, and not the home owner or the farmer, would bear the burden of taxation; and it is in the interest of beneficiaries of these special privileges that the farmer is appealed to to defeat the land value tax.

Thus far of the farmer who owns his farm and the head of a family who owns his home. But what of the tenant farmer and the tenant house holder, two constantly growing classes? They must now pay annually to a landlord all that their land is worth and an indirect tax on what they consume, as well as direct taxes. Under the land value tax they would pay no more for the land than they do now; indeed, they would pay less, for land values would fall with the increase of the market supply of land. They would pay no more for the improvements than they do now, but less; for with the increase of production and reduction of land values both parties to an exchange would get more with less work. And they would pay no taxes on what they consumed, nor any other tax except what they paid to the landlord in the form of ground rent.

But the sum total of benefits to the farmer and the home owner is not yet reached. The average farmer and the average home owner are workingmen. I have considered, so far, only the benefits they will enjoy as consumers; their benefits as producers are yet to be seen. We have already observed that their interests as capital owners and laborers are greater than their interests as land owners; therefore a tax that exempts their interests as capital owners and laborers, even though it wholly absorbs their interests as land owners, must be beneficial to them. And so it is. The wages of their labor will rise with wages generally.

Stating the proposition in the terms of political economy, the land value tax will raise the margin of production, and as wages rise with the rise of the margin of production wages will rise with the imposition of the land value tax. In terms more familiar to the Kansas editor, the land value tax will abolish the value of all land not especially desirable. Any land that is not in demand for use will bear no rent; and land that is not more desirable, even though in use, will also be free of rent. Consequently, occupiers of such land will have no tax to pay. Now, there is a great deal of just such land, but because it is held out of use for speculation users of land must take up with less desirable locations, and as wages are regulated by the produce of the least desirable land in use wages are lower now than they will be when the more desirable locations are to be had free of rent or purchase price.

By wages is meant, of course, the return for one's labor, whether paid by an employer as in factories, or directly out of his produce as in the case of farmers. Hence, the condition of a working farmer in his capacity of producer, as well as in that of consum-
ove under the land value that of the small home
at ever be his vocation.—

ar from the recognition of private oper use of land, the contrary is the case. Treating land as private property stands in the way of its proper use. Were land treated as public property it would be used and improved as soon as there was need for its use or improvement, but being treated as private property, the individual owner is permitted to prevent others from using or improving what he can not or will not use or improve himself.—Progress and Poverty.

The equal right of all men to the use of land is as clear as their equal right to breathe the air—it is a right proclaimed by the fact of their existence. For we can not suppose that some men have a right to be in this world and others no right.—Progress and Poverty.

AN OBDURATE PARENT.

Col. Rithers was fat but very game. I don't know why flesh should be taken into consideration when we speak of physical courage, unless it is because we always regard a game man as a sort of hero and are quite unable, in our fancy, to clothe a hero in a superabundance of flesh. Rithers may not have been an ideal hero, but he was game. It is said that he once slapped Ben Tompson's jaws while that great hero of the shooters was trying to break up a show in Texas, and a man in whose word I have absolute faith told me that the colonel once pulled a Bowie's ears. Yet the old fellow was fat, and still worse was so short that he waddled along like a duck. He had but one pride, a lovely daughter. He looked upon her with the deep love of a devoted father and with the admiring eye of an artist. Indeed, he was something of an artist, having once painted a picture of a Tennessee river sunset, but, unfortunately, had to shoot a man who innocently asked if it did not represent a brush pile on fire.

Whenever Lucie Rithers went into society the old man went with her. He had compelled her to promise that she would never be married, and he had faith in her avowal; still he did not like to see her thrown in the way of temptation. Once a handsome commercial traveler took brazen occasion to smile at her, but he left the community the next day, carrying with him a note which read something like this: "I should like to meet you early to-morrow morning, with a view to shooting an ordinary size hole through your head. I should have obliged myself by doing so to-day, but this being Sunday, and our law imposing a fine for firing a gun on the Sabbath, I refrained. Do not let any business engagement prevent our meeting, for I assure you that I will detain you but a few moments."

One bright morning while a chipmunk was sitting on a stump rhythmically nodding his head to the song of a cat bird, the colonel stood under a tree, communing with nature, and wondering how he was going to get the steers out of the corn field. He had just decided to waddle into the field and curse them out, when a young man rode up to the fence, dismounted gracefully and approached.

"Is this Col. Rithers?" the young man asked.

"Yes, sah. What can I do for you?"

The young fellow, without replying, took out two pistols, and he politely extended their handles toward the colonel, said:

"Take your choice."

"What for?" the colonel asked.

"I haven't the time nor the inclination to explain. Take one and step off about 30 'steps.' "

"Young man," said the colonel, "I am not acquainted with you, but I must say that I like your methods, and, therefore am compelled to accommodate you."

The colonel measured off 30 steps, and at a signal mutually agreed upon, both men fired. The colonel caught a projectile in the fleshy part of his right shoulder.

"Good morning," said the young man.

"Good morning, sah," rejoined the colonel, as he leaned against a tree. The young man gracefully mounted his horse and rode away, and the colonel went home and lay down.

Several months passed. The cat bird was gone and the chipmunk was hidden away under the snow. The colonel stood in the country road, watching the wild geese fly over. A young man came riding along at an easy canter, and, seeing the colonel, dismounted, tied his horse and approached.

"Good morning," said the young man.

"How are you, sah," the colonel responded.

"Rather a bright but chilly day."

"Yes but I don't think this snow will last long."

"No I think not. The wind is shifting round to the south. By the way, colonel, are you busy this morning?"

"No, not particularly. I haven't fed the pigs yet, but I can let them go for a while. Is there anything that I can do for you?

"Yes, I think so," the young man answered, drawing two pistols and telling the colonel to take his choice.

"Look here, young fellow, as I told you some time ago, I do not know you. Of course I am thankful for the attentions which you are showing me, but it has generally been my rule not to accept courtesies from a stranger."

"That's all right; step off 30 yards."

"I'll have to go you, although I haven't fed the pigs yet."

The distance was measured and again they fired at each other. This time the colonel was slightly wounded in the leg. The young man bade him a polite good morning and rode away.

When the colonel went to the house, his daughter seeing that something was the matter with him, said. "Pap, I do wish you would take better care of yourself. It seemes to me the older you grow the more careless you become. What has hurt you this time?"

"Oh, nothing only that infernal spotted sow snapped me when I climbed over into the pen."

"Well, but you should not expose yourself so. If you should die what would become of me?"

"Oh, you'd marry I suppose."

"But you have told me that I shall never marry."

"You shan't so long as I live."

Months passed. The plow hands were in the field and the scent of burning grass pervaded the murky atmosphere. The cat bird had come back to look for her song, the chipmunk timidly peeped from his hole. The colonel stood under a budding alder bush; a young man climbed over the fence.

"Why, good morning, colonel. There has been a slight change in the weather since we last met."

"Yes, as I predicted, the snow is all gone."

"Are you busy this morning?"

"Not excessively."

The young man produced two pistols.

"Look here," said the fat man. "I told you some time ago that we were not acquainted, and now I positively refuse to associate with you until we have been introduced."

"Ah," the young man said, "I hope you will pardon my seeming lack of good breeding. I am John Piller."

"Well, Mr. Piller, I suppose I must accommodate you."

This time the young man was slightly wounded, but he bowed gracefully and smiled as he rode away.

The season had undergone another change. The gray squirrel ran along the top rail of the fence with a brown nut in his mouth; the cat bird was teaching her young ones to fly, and the chipmunk slyly stole through the dying grass. The colonel walked in the orchard where the red apples gleamed in the Indian summer haze. Suddenly he discovered that John Piller was standing near him.

"A beautiful and dreamy day, colonel."

"Yes, nature seems to be humming a sleepy tune."

"And you are surely not busy at such a time?"

"No, I can't say that I am."

"And you can't say that you are not acquainted with me?"

"Oh, no, for the last time we met you were polite enough to introduce yourself."

"Your memory is good. Here are our friends, the pistols."

"Look here, young fellow, I am getting tired of your little flirtations. I never had a man to pester me so in my life. You are positively annoying, sah. What the deuce do you mean, anyway?"

"I mean that I want to marry your daughter Lucie."

"Well, I gad, sah, go and marry her and for the Lord's sake let me alone. I wish I may die dead if I ever had a man to worry me so. Go on and tell her that I say she must marry you, I gad, sah."

There was a happy wedding the next day, and when the few invited guests sat down to dinner, the colonel said:

"Lucie, did he threaten to shoot you unless you married him?"

"Oh, no," she sweetly answered. "We have been engaged for a long time and have been only waiting for your consent."

"Well, blast my extensive hide, he went about it in a queer way. Trying to kill a man is a funny way to gain his good-will."

"Oh, I was not trying to kill you," the bridegroom answered. "The pistols were loaded with peas."

The old fellow snorted and said something about blasting his extensive hide.—Opie P. Read.

A Wisconsin Reminiscence.

"Oh, I don't know as I have any right to tell about early times in Wisconsin," said Andrew Tainter, of Menominee, to a Chicago Tribune reporter, as he lay on the bed of his room in the Grand Pacific, showing that he was a married man by the fact that he had put a newspaper under his feet. "I don't know as I have any call to talk about early times. I went there—let me see—in 1832. That was only the day before yesterday. My father had been out a couple of years before and sent back and got the folks. Law me! but we did have a time getting over those portages. Used to have to all get out, and the Indian and the Frenchman that were with us had to take everything out and pack it. Oh, yes, my mother was pretty lonesome when we got to Prairie du Chien. There were only three white families outside the fort. There were the soldiers' and officers' wives in the fort, but we were three miles from there."

"What did you boys do for fun in those days?"

"Fun? We buckled in and worked for a living. From the time I was 9 years old until I was 18 I was on horseback most of the time herding in cattle and butchering beef and one thing and another. My father had the beef contract for the fort. I went to lumbering in 1846. I've been at it since. I give the lumber industry twenty-five or thirty years more to run at the present rate, and when that time is up people will drive over in buggies to see a tree. Oh, they're cutting off timber altogether too fast. They're getting it out for about enough to pay for hauling. If they'd go a little slower they'd sell just as much lumber and make more money."

"What's the land good for after the lumber is off?"

"Farming. The very lands that people didn't think worth the 62½ cents per acre that the government asked for them are now worth $50 an acre. In those days I don't think I ever heard much of Chicago. Galena was the big town then. Had lots of elk and deer and bear in those days, but I never was much of a hunter. Deer got in my back yard one day and I had to shoot twice before I could kill him. So you see I wasn't much of a shot. Used to be too busy at the saw mill to pay much attention to hunting. One of these old-time up-and down saws it was—up to-day and down to-morrow. They do things faster nowadays. Too fast."

Tigers to Bite 'Em.

In speaking of the minute parasites which are found in the hairy part of a tiger's foot, a scientist says: "They constitute one of the most wonderful curiosities I know of in the animal world. The parasites are so small as to be almost invisible to the naked eye and yet each is a perfect counterpart of the tiger—head, ears, jaw, legs, claws, body, tail, all are there. You may think this is a big story, but look the subject up and see if it is not so."—New York Tribune.

LIFE OF A TRAMP.

A Minister Tries It in Order to Find Out How It Goes.

The Rev. Mr. Delano of the New York Baptist conference did not believe that the tramp was as bad as he was painted, or that he was treated like a brother by his fellow-man. In order to prove the matter to his own satisfaction he spent several weeks of his last vacation on the road. Among his experiences as a tramp were these:

"I came to one house at the close of a peaceful summer's day and saw an old couple sitting together within. My beard was a week old and my hair short enough for a graduate of Sing Sing. My rather prominent nose was burned and frayed in the contest. The old lady had a sweet, benign face framed in a white cap border. She told me to come in and sit down. But the old farmer looked his prejudices.

"What has brought you to such a state as this?" he asked sternly.

"Before I could answer him, the old lady—bless her—remarked in an audible aside: "'Perhaps he knows our Ned.'

"It was her kind and womanly way of disarming him. I did not know 'Our Ned,' but I hope he was worthy of such a mother.

"'Isn't it about time for our bread and milk?' suggested the farmer, and I was invited to partake of the simple and most welcome meal. As I was going, after thanking them, the old man said earnestly:

"'You will be all right if you'll just leave whisky alone.

"This to me; a respectable minister of the gospel! I wanted to drop my assumed character and assure him I never tasted the stuff, but it was too early in my experiment, so I kept silent and resumed my tramp.

"After that I went to houses where the door was opened a crack, and the narrow face of a woman was thrust out for a second, then the door was slammed. Cats arched up their backs and spat at me. Dogs growled at me. I cut hickory wood harder than iron for bread that must have journeyed with the children of Israel, and I slept on a carpenter's bench in the basement through the Christian charity of the owner of the house."

"The last venture I made was into a field where a fire was burning, and three tramps lying beside it. I was glad to meet the tramp on his own ground and learn something of his history and traditions. One of the men jumped up and came to meet me. He did not hold out his hand in a fraternal way, with a smile of welcome and a 'put it there, pard." He eyed me with suspicion, and asked me gruffly what I wanted. He was bigger than I, and the other two men joined him, so I kept a civil tongue, and they gradually warmed to me. The big one was a clergyman's son—just as I was and he knew as much Latin and Greek as I did, and had studied more classic literature and spoke more languages. The other was the son of a millionaire father. The third was an outsider. We slept around the haystack that night and in the morning I told them who I was. The clergyman's son remarked: 'I noticed that you didn't swear.' I heard how every man's hand was against them, and how they were against every man—Ishmaels of the world, soured and embittered by treatment that would not be given to dogs. In my true character I reasoned and prayed with them as I have since pleaded for them.

"Treat the tramp kindly and he goes away with a blessing in his heart. Shut the door in his face and his prayer turns to a curse. That is my experience and belief."—From the Detroit Free Press.

BISMARCK'S FALL.

A story of Bismarck That has not yet Been Published.

That is a very dramatic story that comes from London regarding the true inwardness of the resignation of Count Bismarck. The London Times published recently a story which made a profound sensation throughout Europe, and it is to the effect that after the difference, already related, between the Emperor and his minister, Bismarck exclaimed: "Then I can only tender your majesty my resignation." Little could he dream it would be accepted, and when an aide-de-camp waited on him for it he was sent away with an excuse for its delay.

Now comes the astounding part. Bismarck sought an audience with the Empress Frederick. "In a panic at his fall," relates the London Times, "this man, who but the day before had been the great chancellor, now stooped before her whom he had so long humbled, and explained the danger to the empire involved in his fall, and the fatal consequences which the young emperor risked in this overturning of the founder of the empire. He begged her majesty to intervene and prevent the disaster to Germany, and the remorse that her sovereign would feel at this unmerited humiliation of his most faithful servant."

The Empress heard his story, and her reply will live in history as long as the history of nations shall exist. It was this:

"I much regret being quite powerless. I should have been extremely glad to intervene with my son in your favor, but you so employed all your power in estranging his heart from us, making his mind foreign to mine, that I can only witness your fall without being able to ward it off. When you are no longer there, my son will perhaps draw nearer to me, but then it will be too late for me to help you."

In the entire history of Europe there has never been chronicled a more dramatic scene than this. It needs a Shakespeare to embalm it in immortal literature. The chancellor left the presence of the empress with bowed head, and immediately tendered his resignation, which was accepted.

London in a Fog.

London has been sunless for more than a month. "At one time this afternoon," writes Harold Frederick on Saturday, "it grew so light here in London that one could distinguish houses on the opposite side of the street quite plainly, but it didn't last long, and this evening people are bumping around in the same old pea-soup fog, which has enveloped the metropolis since New Year's. A little of this bat-like existence each winter has certain charms of uniqueness and variety, but Londoners this time are fairly worn out with it. No glimpse of sunshine has been permitted us now for thirty-eight days, and sometimes there have been bannocks of solid darkness lasting for fifty hours at a stretch. Moreover, it has been for the most part exceptionally cold from an English standpoint. To be sure, the mercury has never fallen beyond 13° above zero; but that is deemed such an inhuman temperature here that a driver on a coach between Cantebury and Dover the other night actually allowed himself to be frozen to death by it."

No man is very strong who is not strong enough to control himself.

Demosthenes, the Grecian orator, cured his stammering by having his mouth full of pebbles, and many are the modern orators who have cured their hoarseness by an occassional dose of Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup.

Whatever tends to increase usefulness, by banishing pain and suffering, will certainly secure notice and approval. We allude to Salvation Oil.

Angels are not far away from people who are trying to please God.

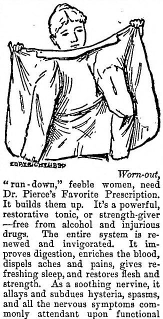
All claims not consistent with the high character of Syrup of Figs are purposely avoided by the Cal. Fig Syrup Company. It acts gently on the kidneys, liver and bowels, cleansing the system effectually, but it is not a cure-all and makes no pretensions that every bottle will not substantiate.



Worn-out, "run-down," feeble women, need Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It builds them up. It's a powerful, restorative tonic, or strength-giver —free from alcohol and injurious drugs. The entire system is renewed and invigorated. It improves digestion, enriches the blood, dispels aches and pains, gives refreshing sleep, and restores flesh and strength. As a soothing nervine, it allays and subdues hysteria, spasms, and all the nervous symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic disease. It's the only guaranteed medicine for women. It does what is promised—or it asks nothing. It gives satisfaction, in every case, or the money paid for it is refunded.

That's the way its makers prove their faith in it. Contains no alcohol to inebriate; no syrup or sugar to derange digestion; a legitimate medicine, not a beverage. Purely vegetable and perfectly harmless in any condition of the system.

MARKED DOWN.

"Take my advice, Jem, it's as much as yer place is wuth—don't go."

"But I promised, Joe, and when a fellow has given his promise, it hadn't orter to be broken—'specially to his mother."

"Wall, mebbe yer right as far as the old woman is concerned, but them's the boss's orders, 'No man leaves these shops till this machine is finished,' which won't be afore 'leven if it ain't nigher twelve, an' yer know well 'nough what'll follow: you'll be 'marked down,' and lose yer job. I won't promise you another."

And the rough middle-aged machinist Joe Walton, drew his brawny, soot-begrimed bare arm across his wrinkled forehead, whistled softly and plied himself clorer to his task.

Jem Mather was a slender youth, aged 17, learning his trade, and receiving also a paltry stipend, little enough for him to exist upon, but from it he had saved enough to bring his little pale-faced mother from the crowed city of New York to his western home.

The world had not dealt fairly with Jem and his mother.

Walter Mather, the father, was an honest, intelligent, hard-working mechanic, who had put something by for a rainy day for his family; but it so happened that the very day the kindly father was killed by an explosion at the mill, the bank wherein his little saving lay was declared insolvent.

Jem was 10 years old then, and for four years he did what he could to help his mother keep "the wolf from the door." He was like his mother, never strong, and the lines of want and care became engraven forever upon his young face.

At 14 a gentleman become interested enough in him to send him west, and to give his mother a place in his house to do plain sewing.

Three years had passed.

Jem was apprenticed for four years. He had one more year to serve, and then he would be earning and receiving the wages of a man.

One year more! How Jem said it over and over to himself. Then he would send for his mother, and they would be so happy.

The wife of Mr. Hart, the gentleman who sent Jem west, and with whom Mrs. Mather made her home, failed in health and died, and Mr. Hart decided to go abroad. To break up his home. He recommended the little woman to other friends, but just then came such a heart-hungry letter from her one lamb, her boy Jem, that she decided to go to him. Mr. Hart hardly approved, but he saw the mother's aching heart showing through her eyes, and placing $100 in her hand and procuring a ticket for her, he saw her safely aboard the train for the west. Mrs. Mather had carefully saved nearly every penny of her earnings since Jem,s absence, so she felt quite rich in a small way, and oh, so rich with with happiness to think she should soon clasp her boy to her heart.

As for Jem, whose every thought and wish was for his little mother, he was jubilant. He, too, had saved, and felt sure they would "get on" somehow until another year and then they would never want again. So he wrote her a gay letter ending with the promise, "I will not fail to meet you at the train." He did not dream of anything to prevent him. The shops closed at 6 o'clock and the eastern train was not due until 8. Plenty of time, was his thought, as he busied himself putting finishing touches to the two small rooms he had procured for their future home. Everything was very simple, even meager, but very clean, and some of the "boys" at the shop had made Jem a few presents in the shape of a rocking chair for his mother, several pots of flowers and a few cheap chromos. They added not a little to the brightness and comfort of his home, and when he closed the door and turned the key to go to his work in the morning, it was not without a little feeling of pride.

They were all in the world to each other, this fond mother and loving, dutiful son.

And now this order had come, "No man to leave the shops until this machine was finished." Jem's heart gave a bound and he gulped down a dry sob. "If it had been any other night," thought Jem, "or I could in any way let mother know," but that seemed impossible; so he confided to his friend Joe his quandary, though for that matter every man in the shops was interested and knew of Mrs. Mather's coming, and nearly all were wondering what Jem would do when the order was given.

Jem's steady habits and kind, obliging ways had won the hearts of most of the workmen, and his love for his mother had touched them all deeply.

"I'll have to manage it somehow," said Jem to himself, with troubled eyes. "It will never do to disappoint mother now. Dear little mother; what would she think?"

The "boss," Tom Greenwick, was a hard master, and Jem knew an appeal to him would be useless. Jem was an obedient lad, too, and if the "boss" had told him personally he must remain with the others, although the order said "men," Jem would have remained.

"It won't take more than half an hour to go to the train, meet her and explain," Jem said to Joe, "and I'll make it up before I leave."

The great drops of perspiration dropped from the boy's face. He toiled as never before.

Fifteen minutes for lunch," thundered Dick Allen, the foreman, just as the clock struck 6.

The men ceased their work instantly, sitting down upon whatever was handiest, not waiting to "wash up"—there was no time.

Jem alone continued his work. Greenwick saw him. "Hurry up there," he said roughly.

"I do not care for lunch," he said respectfully bending lower to his task

The boss, well pleased, passed on and out of the shop, reiterating his order as he went.

"You'll kill yourself working like that an' goin' 'thout eatin', the way you've been doin' so much."

Joe Walton spoke bluntly, but he meant well, and was kind at heart—the best friend Jem had in the shops. He leant Jem a helping hand.

Jem smiled his thanks.

"Still thinkin' of goin'?" asked Joe, dubiously.

Jem lifted a flushed, surprised face and eyes.

"Certainly," he answered with calm emphasis.

"What if you lose yer place?"

"I'll try and manage it so I won't. You see I'm workin' overtime now."

"'Twon't make no difference with him." Joe sighed and nodded.

Nothing more was said. Side by side, the boy and man toiled, Jem keeping a close watch on the clock.

"It's half-past seven, Joe, I'll go now. You'll hardly miss me before I'll be back. Jem took up his old cap.

"Somehow I wish you wouldn't, Jem," Joe said huskily, but the boy was gone.

What a lovely night that was. A portion of the road to the depot led through a little strip of woods. The machine shops being just out of the small village. The moon was at its full and shed its soft silver radiance over everything as with a halo. A dewy fragrance came up from the moistened mold, and filled the evening air, together with the redolence of the wild flowers, coming with a grateful sweetness to the flushed face and tired brain of Jem Mather, with the thought of how "mother" would enjoy this, after the cramped, narrow life in the great dusty city.

The rustling leaves seemd to whisper "don't hurry, Jem," but he could not walk, so ran swiftly along, wiping the perspiration from his face as he went.

Hark! the whistle of the incoming train—then the low, heavy rumble, and now, now it is in sight.

The boy took off his ragged cap and tossed it high in the air. "Hurrah! hurrah," he shouted, with his blue eyes full of moisture.

He caught sight of the little pale-faced mother looking eagerly from the cab window, and knew her at once.

The train was running swiftly in.

The station was upon the other side of the tract. One bound to cross it.

"Mother," he shouted. She heard him, smiled and waved her hand.

Jem saw it, and then!

There was a loud outcry, and a sudden lurch of the train, and the cars stood still. Every one had arisen. The little woman among them.

Something had happend! What?

Through the dim and commotion she heard some one speak her boy's name.

"Jem Mother!"

Dazed and bewildered, Jem's mother reached the platform.

She seemed so alone in all that throng and where was Jem? Where was her boy?

Then something was borne swiftly past her.

She saw and mutely followed.

No one seemed to notice the little strange woman, or to wonder who she was.

The face, all bruised and bleeding that she stood looking down upon was not whiter than her own, and the dead, sightless eyes held still a smile in their blue depths.

Some one led her away at length.

"Come with me," said the rough, kindly, tear-filled voice of Joe Walton.

The news had been borne to the shop at once, and Jem's best friend came.

Yes, the little mother still lives; the pale face, whiter gown, and the dark eyes, with a look from which the light has not all faded, seem always trying to understand.

Kind friends have not left her wholly desolate.

"The boys" care for her for the sake of the lad who was "marked down."

An Indian Brave's Joke.

Two young women were alone one day, when a young Indian brave whom they knew came to see the man of the house. The man was away and the Indian sat down to wait for him. During this interval the girls, being of a lively turn, began asking him questions about his former mode of life; among other things they asked him to give a war-whoop and show them how he scalped people, but he gave no answer. Some time after when they were talking of other subjects and had forgotten all about him, he sprang up suddenly, gave a war-whoop that made the house-top ring, then snatching a big knife that lay on the table with one hand, he took the topknot of one of the girls in the other, and ran the back of the knife around her scalp. They were each scalped in this manner and were nearly frightened out of their wits; but he sat down and began to laugh and told them he had only done what they had asked him to do. They soon recovered from the shock and laughed heartily at the Indian's joke.—Yankton letter to Springfield Republican.

"Drunken Men's Luck."

A Cleveland physician, when asked if there was any explanation for the uniform good fortune of drunken men in escaping injury by accident, said it was due to a lack of interest in their fate. In falling the body is limp and lifeless, while that of a sober man would be very nearly rigid. In the case of the latter, a blow upon any part of the body would be followed by an instantaneous contraction of the muscles, having perhaps, nearly as much force as the blow itself. It was stated by the physician that often the sudden and violent contraction of the muscles caused by a blow furnished nearly half the force exerted to produce the fracture of a bone. A drunken man's muscles, it was explained, would not respond in a similar way to the shock of a blow and he would naturally escape that element of danger.

PANDORA'S PUPIL.

Poor Miss Piper little thought when she began to teach Mr. Slinger, a gentleman of neglected education, how to read and write that her fair fame was in danger. But one day Mrs. Grimm, her landlady paid her a visit, told her she ought to be ashamed of herself to behave so unladylike, that all the neighborhood was talking about the scandal, and wound up by asking the poor little old maid to leave the house.

Poor Miss Pandora! As her friend and landlady walked out of the door with her handkerchief to her eyes she stood motionless, as though turned to a pillar of salt. She saw just how this repair of neglected education must appear to her small circle of discarded pupils, and felt a strong desire to drown herself, or jump out the window, or turn on the gas, or take a box of matches in her tea, and she might actually it seemed to her afterward, have died of mortification, but that the gong at the front door pulled violently at this moment, startled her, and Nora, running up, wrapped in a waterproof cloak, for she had been making preparations to go to bed, announced:

"Mr. Sliger."

"He can't come up," said Pandora, "at this hour of night."

"No, miss; he says for you to come down."

Pandora went down.

Mr. Sliger was at the door.

"There's a telescope at the corner," he said: "something going on in some star or other, I believe. Get a bonnet and shawl and come and take a peep. It will be a lesson in astronomy for me. You can explain it, you know—same terms as the other lessons."

Pandora without a word obeyed.

The door was closed after the two, leaving Mrs. Grimm staring at Nora.

"That's the capsheaf," said the lady.

"Shall I sit up for 'em?" asked Nora.

"No," said Mrs. Grimm. "I will."

Meanwhile Miss Pandora and Mr. Sliger peeped through the telescope and saw the rings of Saturn, which Mr. Sliger supposed to be phenomenal and temporary, and which were explained by Miss Pandora to be fixtures, and then adjourned to an ice cream saloon of much elegance.

This, indeed was desperate dissipation, Miss Pandora said to herself, as she sat before the cut-glass goblets on the damask cloth and saw the water splash from the little fountain in the center into the acquarium and over the glossy plants, all reflected in the long mirrors. However, what did it matter? She was already "talked about," turned out of her lodgings as a person who had gone wrong. She would keep this merry moment to remember when she had put an end to all by saying to the neglected pupil that she could no longer impart instruction to him.

He was ordering every indigestible luxury on the bill of fare, the diamond on his little finger flashing like a small sun, obsequious waiters bobbing about behind them. He looked kindly at her, and asked her if she liked this or that. He was as simple as an old baby; as kind as an old lady, and he was a nice, pleasant-looking man.

"All over! All over!" she said to herself. "I might have known what a wicked world this is, and how ill it thinks of innocent things. Why might not I go on teaching him forever without harm?"

People were coming in from concerts, from the theaters; tables were filling, but theirs, between the two columns beyond the fountain, was very quiet.

The waiters were gone to execute Mr. Sliger's behests. Suddenly he turned to her and took a letter from his pocket.

"Miss Piper," he said, "read that." Pandora opened the missive and perused it.

It was from a firm of lawyers, speaking in plain terms of Mr. St. Leger as a gentleman and a man of honor and fortune.

"I did not need it, indeed," said Pandora sadly. "And this is the way your name is really spelt? St. Leger! It's a beautiful name."

"It sounds a little curious to me," he said. "Mother wrote it Sliger. I never knew; but you see I'm all right. They never took me without a character when I—went for a place—in the poor times, and I couldn't expect you to take me without a character either. I—I don't know whether you despise me for my ignorance or not; but if you don't why I want you to take me for your pupil for life—to marry me, you know, Pandora. Will you?"

It was a dreadful thing to do in such a public place, but Pandora Piper felt that she was going to faint—the room grew black.

"It was in my mind the first day I came," he said. "I had seen you often through the window, when you gave lessons to that little girl at Bell's. I used to watch you with my opera glass. I felt sure that you were just the woman for me, and every lesson you gave me proved it. I shall learn everything from you—goodness as well as spelling. Oh, say yes! I want you! I want you!

She said "Yes."

Mrs. Grimm was sitting up for her, pale with wrath, when she returned; but Pandora took her by both hands and said:

"You won't turn me out until after my wedding day, will you, dear! You'll let me get married here. It's next week. Mr. St. Leger won't wait. You see we will have to go to England to live on the estate. And, after all, a poor little teacher needs no great preparation.

"Servants and diamonds and a country house and a city house, and every thing heart could wish," Mrs. Grimm says, in telling her story. A real great lady now. It's like a romance."

Helpless 40 Days

The great agony caused by rheumatism is indescribable, and the gratitude of those who take Hood's Sarsaparilla and are cured is often beyond expression. The following is from a well-known Wisconsin farmer, and is endorsed by the editors of the Neillsville, Wis., Times as entirely true:

"For 25 years I have suffered with sciatic rheumatism. Last November I was taken worse than ever, and was unable to get out of the house. I was almost helpless for forty days, suffering great agony all the time. In December I commenced taking Hood's Sarsaparilla. After the second bottle I was able to be out and around and attend to business. I took five bottles, and am now so free from rheumatism that only occasionally I feel it slightly on a sudden change of weather. I have great confidence in Hood's Sarsaparilla." CHARLES HANNAH, Christie, Clarke Co., Wis.

Trousers' Bottom Protector.

It seems as if the ingenuity of the inventor would never tire of seeking for new worlds to conquer. A singular invention is the subject of a recent patent. This is neither more nor less than a trousers' protector, which is held to the trousers by means of two small spring clips, and the balls or projections at its lower edge prevents the bottom of the trousers from coming in contact with the ground and getting muddy. It is claimed that by its use it is impossible to pick up mud, and that the unsightly method of turning up the bottoms of trousers in wet weather is avoided. It is said to be not noticeable when worn, and is made in different colors to suit the cloth. It weighs one-eight of an ounce, and can be instantly fixed or removed.

Not Perishable.

A colored man, who, a few days ago, obtained a marriage license, was at the clerk's office asking that it be taken back and the dollar refunded. The anxious clerk asked if the license was not filled up properly, and the answer was, "I thought so; but I find the lady is lawfully married already, and of course I can't marry her."

"You don't know," said some one in the office; her husband may die, or there may be a divorce, and the license will keep." The applicant went off still holding the license.—Washington Star.

To Provide for Kossuth.

A London writer has alluded to the straitened circumstances in which Louis Kossuth finds himself. The Buda-Pesth Athenæum offered him an advance of 3,000 florins on his writings, but the old man, with characteristic honesty, declined it on the ground that at his age he could not be sure of completing the work. However, an arrangement will be made which will obviate all risk of his suffering from want during the remainder of his life.

Official Paper of the City.

JAS. MEEHAN, JR. Editor and Prop.

Adolph Bierman appoints a North Dakota man for a clerkship in the state auditors office. A terrible howl is raised. The county commissioners of Polk county give the printing to a Dakota paper—a calm ensues in the vicinity of the Crookston Times office. A proper diagnosis of the two cases will show McKenzie out in the former while in the latter he is in.

David Bennett Hill claim the first places in the heart of the democratic people of the United States, first because he is a democrat and again because of his unswerving allegiance to democratic principles in the last campaign. The refusal of Gov Hill to accept the senatorship from New York clearly demonstrates the fact that he will be in the field for the presidental nomination in 1892.

St. Hilare is opposed to granting the people of Polk county the right to voice their sentiments in the matter of county division. That berg partakes of the nature of the mule, not only in its manner of kicking but it has no pride in it's past history and no hopes of future increase.

Senator Lommen is sending out letters to alliance officials in this section, perhaps in the interest of Crookston, asking opinions regarding a division of the county, stating, at the same time, his opposition. It would be well for the senator to remain neutral and await developments or two years hence await political death at the hands of the alliance.

AN EXCITING RIDE IN A LIFT.

The American Thought He Was Going to Come Down Standing on His Head.

"London may not be provided with elevators on anything like the scale that New York is," said a man recently who spent his vacation abroad, "but I saw a 'lift' there the like of which I do not believe exists in this country. I entered an office building in London, which was not far from the Bank of England, to see a friend who was on the top floor. In the corridor I saw a number of boxes following one another up one shaft and down another. They were attached to an endless chain, and were large enough to hold several persons.

"I looked at the machine in some doubt, when suddenly a man stepped out of one of the boxes or cars which was coming down. The car, which was going at what seemed to me a rather rapid rate of speed, did not stop, the man jumping off it while it was in motion. Pretty soon I saw other men jumping in and out of the cars, which were about as far apart on the endless chain as the distance from floor to floor. I at first hesitated about risking my limbs and life on the contrivance, but finally stepped into an ascending car just before its bottom was on a level with the floor.

"No sooner had I done this than I began to get afraid that I might be crushed to death between the car and the floor or ceiling when I tried to step off. Of a sudden it struck me that if I did not get off at the top floor I would be carried to the roof, and then be stood on my head in the car as it turned over. I was in a perfect fever of anxiety and could hardly screw up my courage to the point of alighting, but I managed to do this when the top floor was reached. I found that it was much easier to get out than I had supposed, and when I finished my call I boldly rode down on the machine.

"I afterward learned that a man who did not get out of an ascending car at the top floor would be in no danger of being turned upside down at the top of the shaft, because the car always maintains its upright position. This is due to the fact that only the roof of the car is fastened to the cable, so the car always remains bottom downward by its own weight. A 'lift' like this may be economical, as it does away with the need of men to run it, but I myself much prefer the safe American machine."—New York Tribune.

Doctors and Advertising.

Bitter complaint is heard from the medical profession regarding the severity of the unwritten law of professional etiquette. It is not that medical men are forbidden to advertise themselves, it is that they are constantly under suspicion of advertising themselves when they are really doing nothing of the sort. Lecturing is just now the bone of contention. If a medical man has the gift of public speaking "on every conceivable topic," as somebody has sneeringly put it, why cannot he be allowed to instruct and entertain his fellow creatures from a public platform? And if the committee of the literary and scientific institute will print the name of "Dr. Abernethy Astley Cooper Jones" in big type, with a whole row of initials after it, is it fair to make him responsible for that?

A medical correspondent, who from obvious motives suppresses his name, confesses to finding "intense pleasure and relaxation in addressing an intelligent audience," but he had to endure "the darts of slander." A friend of his, a medical man of similar ability and most excellent literary attainments, loved and respected by all who come in contact with him, has the fortune or misfortune to be one of our best public speakers. He can make ten guineas by one evening address, and earn as much in an hour and a half as his detractors can do in a week, but, owing to the "intolerable priggish attitude" of his fellow practitioners, he is obliged even to cease his gratuitous efforts on behalf of the churches, chapels and local charities.—London

WHERE WOMEN MUST WORK.

Hardships and Drudgery That "the Weaker Sex" Undergoes in Europe.

When one gets into Switzerland the appellation of weaker sex as applied to women seems to be a misnomer. In point of endurance and often even of muscular strength, the peasant women of the remoter valley appear quite the equals of the men. One sees them moving on those green, beautiful slopes over which the snow peaks tower, and a party of girls swinging the antique Swiss scythes with their straight snaths, that bend the figure so cruelly, cut broad, even swaths with the regularity of veterans. They do not keep pace with each other across the fields; one seldom sees in the European peasant, man or woman, any pronounced signs of emulation. They do not work with any appearance of haste or conscious outflow of energy, but in slow, plodding, untiring fashion they work hour after hour, beginning by 5:30 in the morning and turning homeward when daylight fails.

To see the storing of hay in the Alpine chalets is to get a new idea of the muscular prowess of women. The crops of the upper slope are packed in back loads to the little red brown log structures that dot the mountains as high as the cattle can find pasturage, and the weight that a woman will lift on the wooden frame that is adjusted to her shoulders and with which she will climb, or which often is harder, will descend to the nearest chalet, dropping her burden through a hole in the roof, from which the shingles and the heavy stones that hold them in place have been removed, is a source of perpetual wonder. When the harvest has been gathered there are back baskets of manure to carry to fit the ground for winter crops, and even the little girls not yet in their teens climb like cats carrying their own little back baskets well loaded.

On the Lake of Lucerne the boat women are characteristic figures. The long, low, black freight barges are pulled from port to port by mixed crews of men and women, from ten to twenty to a boat, who work the heavy sweeps standing. I have counted three women keeping stroke with a dozen men, and again the proportions reversed almost exactly. In the heat of the day the men strip to their waists and the women unlace their bodices and work with bare arms. Occasionally one sees women porters, who pack portmanteaus and luggage of all sorts up and down the mule paths for the influx of summer visitors.

In Germany one can nowhere escape the sight of the outdoor labor of woman. Along the flat valley of the middle Rhine the vineyards, the grain patches and the tobacco fields are full of them. In an afternoon's ride the proportion of women getting in the harvest often seems as three to two men. In these fertile lands there is a social, companionable side to the work which one might go far to find paralleled. In the fields which stretch between the huddled villages one sees whole families busy.

At one end of the corn strip, under a tree or clump of bushes, stands a baby wagon. Its occupant has learned to take life philosophically, and croons at the blue sky or the green leaves. At the noon hour the midday meal is eaten picnic fashion, with the baby wagon for a center, and the young subject of the kaiser is passed with the black bread from hand to hand.

The loading of the great German hay wagons is always interesting. You will see a brown woman, her head tied up in a scarlet 'kerchief, on top of the load distributing the forkfuls as they are passed up to her. If one woman loads for one man her work is easier, though requiring more skill. But when, as one often sees, one woman loads for three or four men she has by far the hardest position. There are few evidences, indeed, of any division of work between men and woman as to the stronger and weaker animal. The physical capacity of the woman is counted on, and to all appearance with good reason.—Cor. Pittsburg Leader.

The Editor of The Century.

Mr. R. W. Gilder, the editor of The Century Magazine, who has attained a high rank in the world of literature, commenced his literary career as a reporter at a small salary on a Newark newspaper. He is the son of a Methodist clergyman, and was for a time employed in connection with one of the New Jersey railways in a subordinate position. From the beginning of his newspaper career he displayed the poetic faculty, insomuch that he invested many of the most trivial items with the "glamour of poesie." He was ambitious, diligent, and while not especially studious kept abreast of literary movements, and also kept his eyes open for opportunities of promotion. The position he has achieved is the legitimate outcome of his diligence and persistence in overcoming ordinary obstacles. Like most men who have made their way to success, he retains in a striking degree the modest simplicity which marked him when obscure and unknown.—Frank Leslie's Newspaper.

Human Proportions.

The proportions of the human figure are six times the length of the right foot. Whether the form is slender or plump the rule holds good on an average; any deviation from the rule is a departure from the beauty of proportion. It is claimed that the Greeks made all of their statues according to this rule. The face from the highest point of the forehead, where the hair begins, to the end of the chin is one-tenth of the whole stature; the hand from the wrist to the end of the middle finger is also one-tenth of the total height.

From the crown to the nape of the neck is one-twelfth the stature. If the face from the roots of the hair to the chin be divided into three equal parts, the first division determines the place where the eyebrows should meet, the second the opening of the nostrils. A man of good proportions is as tall as the distance between the tips of his fingers when both arms are extended to full length.—St. Louis Republic.

Eddie Gould a Young Giant.

Edwin Gould is a young giant. He is twice as big as his father, and Mr. Jay Gould is very proud of him. Edwin has the build of a blacksmith. He is an expert fencer, a good horseman and a boxer of no mean skill. Young Gould is a member of the Manhattan Athletic club, and he is not afraid to put on the gloves with the most skillful of the members.

The Austrian Navy.

Austria has been slowly falling behind in her navy for several years. Since the launch of the Tegettboff, in 1878, she has laid down but two armored vessels, both of the second class. With but a narrow strip of seacoast, but one first class seaport and small mercantile marine, her moderate expenditure for naval defense is doubtless a wise measure of economy.—New York Herald.

Small and Great Blessings.

Of all the days in the year there seems to be none less fitted for calamity than Thanksgiving day, and yet that was the very one which Tommy Wentworth chose for falling from the high mow and almost breaking his neck. He was picked up unconscious from the shock, and yet safe and sound.

Uncle John carried him into the house, and Aunt Sarah postponed basting the turkey for an indefinite period, while she rubbed him in arnica and held the smelling salts to his nostrils. Then, when he did "come to" how the old people rejoiced, and the frightened cousins, standing about silent with awe, went whooping out to play.

In his prayer, before saying grace that noon, Uncle John offered fervent thanksgiving that the little boy had suffered no serious harm. His voice trembled and grew husky as he proceeded, and Aunt Mary put up her handkerchief and wiped away two big tears trickling down her cheeks. But Aunt Mary was a practical woman, and one, moreover, who was prone to say unexpected things at any moment when they happened to occur to her.

"Amen," said Uncle John, and then Aunt Mary opened her eyes, and apparently dismissed for the present all dismal possibilities.

"Well, Tommy," said she briskly, "there's one thing I'm thankful for—that them nice new pants of yours didn't get a rip or a stain when you fell!"

Then she wondered why everybody laughed, and why she was thereafter accused of loving little Tommy's trousers more than little Tommy himself.—Youth's Companion.

Cancer and Smoking.

Since the death of President Grant, a constant smoker, cancer of the tongue and cigar smoking have been closely associated in the public mind. Surgeons of experience find that the disease is far more frequent in persons who have been in the habit of smoking. The disease appears to be about six times more common in males than in females.

The affection known as "smoker's patch" is common. It is a slightly raised oval area on the fore part of the tongue, a little to one side of the middle line, just where the end of the pipe rests or where the stream of smoke from the pipe or cigar impinges on the surface of the tongue. The patch is usually red, but it may be bluish or pearly white. It lasts for years, but tends to spread over the surface of the tongue if the irritation be continued. When diffused in this fashion it constitutes leucoma of the tongue.

Leucoma is certainly a predisposing cause of cancer. The smoker should never leave a "patch" untreated, and should avoid rough mouthpieces and brands of tobacco which cause irritation of the tongue.—Hall's Journal.

Electrical Furnaces.

It seems not unlikely that electricity will be applied to smelting furnaces in the near future. An electrical furnace has been patented in England which is said to have given excellent results in the series of tests to which it has been subjected. The electrodes are blocks of a carbon secured in metal cases, and placed opposite to each other in the walls of the furnace. The metal cases containing the carbons are kept cool by circulating water around them, and the carbons themselves are capable of automatic adjustment to compensate for wear. Provision is made in the furnace for the escape of gas and for the introduction of the charge, and the electromotive force of the current can be varied according to the varying resistance of the charge.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Not a Bump of Parental Affection.

"The development at the back of the head, my friends, indicates parental affection," explained the phrenologist. "Now, you will observe," he went on, feeling the head of the boy on the platform, "that this bump is abnormal in size, thus indicating that this lad loves and reveres his parents to an unusual degree. Is not that so, my lad?"

"No."

"What? You do not love your parents?"

"I think well enough of mother," replied the boy, "but I ain't very fond of father. That bump you're a-feelin' of he gave me last night with a stick."—London Tit-Bits.

When the Pen Was as Good as the Dagger.

The styles used for writing at about the beginning of the Christian era were almost as dangerous when in the hand of an excited Roman senator as a stiletto is in the hands of an enraged Italian. Cassianus, a refugee bishop who had set up a school in Rome, was stabbed to death by his scholars, who used a stylus as an instrument of execution. Cæsar himself once seized Cassius by the wrists and stabbed him in the arms with a stylus.—St. Louis Republic.

That thereafter, to-wit: On the 16th day of August, 1887, said mortgagee, for value received, sold and duly assigned said mortgage to Albert W. ECHOES OF THE RAIPDS

THE TOYS.

My little son, who look'd from thoughtful eyes,
And moved and spoke in quiet grown up wise,
Having my law the seventh time disobey'd,
I struck him, and dismiss'd
With hard words and unkiss'd,
His mother, who was patient, being dead.
Then fearing lest his grief should hinder sleep
I visited his bed,
But found him slumbering deep,
With darken'd eyelids, and their lashes yet
From his late sobbing wet.
And I, with moan,
Kissing away his tears, left others of my own;
For on a table, drawn beside his head,
He had put within his reach
A box of counters and a red vein'd stone,
A piece of glass abraded by the beach,
And six or seven shells,
A bottle with bluebells,
And two French copper coins, ranged there with careful art,
To comfort his sad heart.
So when that night I pray'd
To God, and wept and said:
"Ah, when at last we lie with tranced breath,
Not vexing thee in death,
And thou rememberest of what toys
We make our joys,
How weakly understood
Thy great commanded good,
Then, fatherly not less
Than I whom thou hast molded from the clay,
Thou'lt leave thy wrath and say,
'I will be sorry for their childishness.'"

Another of the many accidents that have happened on the hill leading to Park addition occurred Monday. Teilesfore Brunelle was driving one of Ralph & Bourdon's teams up the hill with a big load of flour destined for the depot. When up about one third the distance, the wagon sloughed and the whole business, wagon, horses, flour and all went down the side of the hill, a distance of about 20 feet. Nothing was injured, which was almost miraculous under the circumstances.

Frank Kratka was down from Thief River Falls Tuesday and brought news of the Indian scare. The settlers around Thief River Falls are thoroughly frightened, but it seems there can be no logical grounds for their apprehensions. In the village they have extended picket lines and men are on guard day and night. The Sioux chiefs may have installed some of their insane religious frenzy into these Indians, but the general impressen is thare can be no danger from these sensible Chippewas. There are about 3,000 of them gathered.

The school board is considering the feasibility of advancing the grade of our schools one grade, thus giving it the rank of a high-school. The principal would then devote himself to teaching the new and higher grade, while another teacher would act as his assistant, and teach the branches now studied in the principal's room. Another primary teacher would be employed. When the new school house is completed, it would seem but a consequent measure. Adkancement in the schools of a place is but the reflection of thrift in in the commnresal line. If there is opportunity for this step, it should be made. Give our young people a chance to attain at home what they otherwise must seek abroad or forego entirely. As to the new school house, the people want to see it built, and there will be a loud murmur of displeasure if its completion is delayed.

A "Clothes-pin Sociable." More than one curious thought was aroused by the announcement that such an event was to transpire at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Hunt Thursday last. The attendance was very large, and the program furnished sufficient enjoyment. Clothes-pins were dressed in pairs to represent different characters. No less personages than Grover Cleveland, Sitting Bull's favorite squaw, and other notables were to be found there. The clothes-pins easily determined who were partners for the evening. The choral society rendered two good songs; Mrs. J. D. Marshall and Miss Minnie Zaiser a duet while Allie Crowell and Scottie Hall, two urchins whose musical precocity is quite remarkable, sung a song, which was heartily applauded. Prof. Julius Hortvet read an essay. Refreshments were served in due order. Then Grover Cleveland and Mrs. Sitting Bull were put up to be bid on by respective admirers. Grover brought thirty cents while his dusky contemporary went him six better. The occasion will be remembered as a successful and unique event.

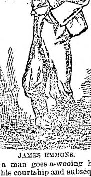
WOES OF WOOERS.

They Abandoned the Beaten Paths of Custom.

AND AS A RESULT HAD TROUBLE.

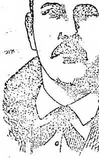
James Emmons Tarred and Feathered Because He Courted a Colored Girl. An Unlucky Masher—A Jealous Man's Murderous Rage.



JAMES EMMONS.

When a man goes a-wooing he should carry on his courtship and subsequent preliminaries to happiness within the limitations set down by the laws and social customs of the community to which he belongs. If, through jealousy, ignorance, misplaced affection or deliberate intention, he violates the established canons, the chances are about ninety-nine out of a hundred that he will find himself figuring unpleasantly in that most disagreeable of all predicaments which an amused and unsympathizing world calls "a woman scrape."

It is for the reason that he has overstepped the bounds prescribed by the majority of the inhabitants of Freehold town, in Monmouth county, N. J., that James Emmons now wears a frightened look upon his face and several obstinate patches of tar upon his body. James is the son of a farmer, and has a very large relationship living in the vicinity of his home, so large, indeed, that it has been the custom of generations for an Emmons to wed with an Emmons. This particular branch of the big family tree, however, recently violated the precedent in a manner which has brought him sorrow and much pain. Near the family residence lived Hampton Sparks and his burly wife. Mr. and Mrs. Sparks are decidedly dark hued-colored people, but their daughter Alla is of lighter complexion than either of her parents, and boasts a wealth of kinky red hair. She is a short and dumpy young woman, with no pretensions to beauty, but in her it was that young James saw the chosen of his heart. He prosecuted his wooing under great difficulties. His mother remonstrated, his father sought legal advice, and the neighborhood lads made him the butt of broad and suggestive jokes; but Alla smiled on him and her parents welcomed his visits.



OSMAN DAY.

As a last resort James' mother had him arrested on a charge of assault. After two weeks in jail he promised to abandon his dusky sweetheart and was released. Meanwhile, because of the affair, the Sparks family had been compelled to move to Bergen's Mills, five miles distant. James followed them and became an inmate of their house. Then the trouble began all over again. The Emmons family made loud complaints, the Sparks family displayed too many tokens of triumph, and Jim and Alla cooed and billed to their heart's content while the storm gathered about them.

It seems that the young men of Englishtown, a nearby village, delight in having fun when there is any excuse for its perpetration. They found in the current scandal ample reason for taking action, and one night not long ago as many of them as could get into two big wagons drove out to the Sparks residence. A knock at the door was answered by Hampton Sparks, and a demand was made upon him to produce Jim Emmons. He declined to do so, but when the crowd threatened to sack the house James appeared, accompanied by Alla. The negro girl's lover was at once seized by the leaders of the party, among whom were his own brother and two of his cousins.

The prisoner was taken some distance down the road, and informed that he was to be tarred and feathered as a punishment for disgracing his relations and race. At this point Alla interfered with the statement that she and Jim were married. It was a fatal admission, and settled the treatment of the captive. His clothing was torn from his body, the brushes were plied vigorously and in a few minutes from head to heels Jim was blacker than any of the Sparks tribe. He retained this hue only for an instant, for feathers of all sizes and colors were poured upon the coat of tar; and their work accomplished, the midnight visitors sped back to town.

It took some days for young Emmons to get rid of the sticky and disagreeable mixture, but as soon as he was able to be out he showed that he was determined not to submit tamely to the indignity put upon him. Going before a justice of the peace he procured warrants for the entire crowd—some twenty-[illegible]e in number—and each prisoner has been held in $200 bail to await the action of the grand jury. Meanwhile James is again in custody, for under an old section of the code his mother has had him locked up on a charge of improper conduct.

The style of love making which got Osman Day into trouble is of a sort entirely different from that which is the source of the New Jersey youth's woes. Osman Day is an ex-member of a provincial parliament in Australia, but now lives at San Francisco, where, during the last few months, he has awakened the lively interest of the police. He first came into prominence on being accused of stealing a lady's diamond cross. He was acquitted of the charge, and since then has engaged so actively in the practice known as "mashing" that he was warned by the patrolman to keep away from Kearney and Market streets. Thus restricted of the pastime of ogling fair pedestrians, he found compensation in writing letters, urging respectable women to make appointments with him. The wife of a Sansome street merchant became so annoyed by his unwelcome attentions that she informed her husband. At his direction she wrote to Day naming a rendezvous, and received the following reply:

> DEAR MAMIE—You can only form a most inadequate conception of the delight I feel in writing to one whose praise and love I shall covet most. I shall indeed be most happy to meet you this evening (Thursday). I will wait for you, at the place which we appointed, at 8 o'clock. You, dear Mamie, will strive to be there. I may kindly tell you that there is something about you which made me conceive a regard for you of which some day I may be able to give you a proof. I shall indeed be pleased to see you again. So till then, my dear little girl, farewell. Be just, be generous, be free! Respect what is dear to you. Seek an immortality in love and the deity in nature. In short, sanctify your love on a temple and the angel of noble thoughts will not disdain to appear in it. Be assured of my regard for you, and ever believe me to remain whilst I inherit life and light, always yours to the last crust,
>
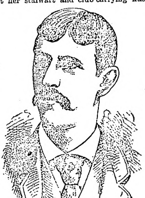
> P. S.—I send you a kiss.

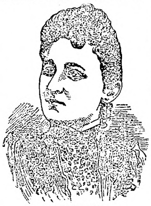
The husband, accompanied by a friend, kept the tryst. Mr. Day also appeared upon the scene, but when he saw that the one awaiting him was not "dear Mamie," but her stalwart and club carrying husband, he made tracks down the street at a speed which soon left his pursuers far behind.



JOHN KINNEY.

A wooing more tragic than either of those already mentioned was that of John Kinney and Ella Levick. These young people resided at Washington Court House, O., and the man was intensely jealous of his betrothed. One evening not long ago they attended a ball together, and Kinney became furiously angry because Miss Levick danced with others.

The next day at noon he forced his way to her room, where she was lying on a lounge, and drawing a revolver remarked that he would like to kill her. As this had been his most frequent threat during the time of their acquaintance the girl did not take it seriously, but told him to shoot, saying, "I will die with a smile on my lips." Kinney, who was standing at a distance of only five feet, immediately fired. The ball entered Miss Levick's breast just above the right nipple, tore its way through her lung, and lodged behind the right shoulder blade. The wounded woman sprang up screaming, and then, fearing that she was about to die, began to repeat the Catholic litany. As she prayed her assassin again approached, and pointing the pistol at her exclaimed, "Let up on that or I'll finish the job." Her entreaties changed his mood, however, and taking a ring from his finger he placed it upon hers. Then he kissed her good-by and fled. Within an hour he was arrested and lodged in jail.



ELLA LEVICK.

CEPHAS DE WERDE.

The Acquittal of Frank Ward.

The acquittal at Washington of Frank Ward, who was charged with the murder of Maurice Adler, ends a highly sensational case. The killing occurred in a saloon one summer day of 1889.

Adler was well known, especially among the sporting fraternity. Ward had been a prominent and prosperous business man, and one of the best known men about town.

Ward was imprisoned for a few months, but afterward was admitted to bail on the plea that the close confinement was seriously injuring his health. Senator Blackburn was one of the counsel for the defense, and delivered the closing appeal to the jury. The contention of the defense was that Ward did not fire the fatal ball directly at Adler, but that he fired at the ceiling, and that it was in ricochetting that it accidentally struck him. But the main plea was insanity, and that seems to have been the winning card.

Died from a Fall and a Kick.

The death is announced of His Excellency Jonathan Charles Frederick, hereditary chief of the Mosquito Indian reservation in Nicaragua, in the twenty-fifth year of his age and the twentieth month of his reign. He died after a brief illness of five days, resulting from the effects of a fall and a kick he received from his horse, which is said to have produced acute inflammation of the liver.

History of the Turkey.

The turkey is a lineal descendant from the wild North American species, which was found in Mexico by the Spaniards at the time of the conquest, both wild and domesticated. The Spanish sailors and soldiers introduced it into the West India islands under the name of pavon, or peacock.

From the West Indies the bird was taken to Spain, where it was called pavon de las Indias. The French called it dindon, a contraction of coq d'Inde. Evidently the East Indies were confounded with the West, for when this fowl was introduced into Germany it was known as the "Calicut hen."

Maj. W. Ross King says that the bird was introduced into England about 1520 to 1524, and that it received the name which it has since borne simply because it was then the custom to refer the origin of all strange and foreign articles to Turkey. It would not be at all surprising to find all the trade with Mediterranean ports at that time credited to that country.

Readers will recall how in the time of the Crusades, a few centuries before, it had been the practice to speak of all Mohammedan people as Saracens, while the fact was that that people were but a small tribe in Arabia. The instances are quite parallel.

When the fowl was brought to this country, its original home, it kept the name which had been given it in England, and more than that it gave this name to the undomesticated variety, which has since been known as the wild turkey. The circle was completed, and a bird that belonged exclusively to this continent, without having gone away from its home at all, got credit for having been brought from the east. It is a good example of the confusion of names likely to occur almost anywhere.—Youth's Companion.

The New Money Fad.

"Certainly," replied the teller, recognizing in the applicant the confidential clerk of one of the bank's heaviest depositors. The money was handed out in clean, crisp tens and fives that had never been in circulation. After the young man had gone the teller remarked to the writer: "That new money fad is on the increase. Just as soon as a man begins to feel a little tony he gets the notion that no member of his family ought to handle the soiled and crumpled currency in general circulation. When the madame goes a-shopping she must have her purse filled with brand new bills.

"Many persons explain their mania for new money on the theory that there is contagion in the much handled bills. They seek to keep disease away from their family circle by excluding, to as full an extent as possible, all money that has been in circulation. They keep a supply of new bills of various denominations constantly on hand, and the ladies of the household feel that they are thus well protected against contagion." Most of the new money is procured directly from the banks, but there are frequent individual applications at the sub-treasury for new bills and new coin. When the sub-treasury has an abundance of small denomination bills on hand such applications are unhesitatingly complied with.—Montreal Star.

Wonderful Peculiarity in Eyes.

If still living, Miss Nancy Taylor, of Grant township, Taylor county, Ia., is possessed of one of the most remarkable pairs of eyes ever heard of this side of the realms of wonderland. Her curious optical defect has been known to her parents ever since she was a small child, and to the people of that portion of Taylor county since the child first started to school, but her fame on account of the freakish characteristics of her eyes did not spread beyond the limits of the state until about 1887, when Miss Nancy had reached the mature age of 10 years.

Persons with but a smattering of optics know that oculists have a theory that everything we see is seen in its inverted order; daily association from the cradle up being all that makes such objects appear in regular order, the impression conveyed to the brain by the optic nerve showing objects standing just the reverse to the way our "seeing sense" teaches us they are. In this lies the Taylor girl's remarkable optical deformity. When she reads a book or paper she does so by holding it inverted before her eye. While relatives standing a few feet away appear all right to her, the paper or book must be turned upside down before a word can be read.—St. Louis Republic.

Firemen's Superstitions.

Firemen are peculiarly subject to notions. The untimely sounds of musical instruments, the uncanny influence of three white horses passing the engine house in succession, or the baneful effects of two or more gentlemen entering the house, all wearing stovepipe hats, at the same time, have been noted. Said a Washington fireman to a reporter:

"When you came in here one day with that stovepipe on and asked me if the captain was upstairs, I was talking to a downtown fireman who had a 'day off.' He said as soon as he saw you we should surely have an alarm. You hadn't left the captain an hour before we were hard at work at a fire. There is something very strange about this. There certainly seems to be something in it. Don't you think so?"—Washington Star.

A Recruit for the Chain Gang.

While a gang of men was working on the streets of Omaha a few days ago a gaunt stranger asked the person in charge if he could use another man. An affirmative reply being given, the recruit was set to work, and for two hours swung a broom industriously. He then asked one of his associates if he knew of a good boarding house. "I guess you board where I do," was the answer. "Where is that?" "In the city jail," replied the old hand. To his surprise and anger the stranger learned that he was working in the "chain gang," and that the individual in charge was a police officer.—Omaha Bee.

Jay Gould's Cigars.

Jay Gould smokes the best cigar in the market during business hours. Four cigars a day are his limit, and he usually buys them at the stand in the Windsor hotel. He pays twenty-five cents apiece for them, and if he feels like smoking more he waits until he reaches home, when he partakes of the luxury of a Turkish pipe.

When Mr. Gould was ill Dr. Munn told him he must be temperate in the use of tobacco, and not, under any circumstances, smoke over four cigars a day.—New York World.

There was exciting times in the lower house of the Colorado legislature. There are two Republican factions in the house, one led by H. H. Eddy and the other by James Brown. The Brown crowd number fourteen, and by forming an unexpected combine with the Democratic members secured a working majority. When the newly elected speaker, Hanna, attempted to announce his standing committees, the Brown-Democratic faction blocked legislation and the result was that nothing could be accomplished. Brown was ordered under arrest for interrupting the speaker. The sergeant-at-arms started to arrest Brown, when four deputy sheriffs sprang into the aisle and defied the sergeant-at-arms to do so. A scene of the wildest confusion and uproar prevailed. Quiet was finally restored, but the deadlock continued until midnight, when the Brown-Democratic wing, numbering twenty-eight members, walked out and organized another lower house all by themselves. This will complicate legislation this winter. Speaker Hanna is firm, and has employed fifteen assistant sergeants-at-arms.

A DEAD HISTORIAN.

An Order Issued by President Harrison Regarding the Funeral of the Late Mr. Bancroft.

Another Order from the Navy Department of Which Mr. Bancroft Was Once Secretary.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20.—The president issued the following executive order to-day:

The death of George Bancroft, which occurred Saturday, removes from among the living one of the most distinguished Americans. As an expression of the public loss and sorrow, the flags of all the executive departments at Washington and of the public buildings in the cities through which the funeral party is to pass, will be placed at half-mast on to-morrow morning until the body of this eminent statesman, scholar and historian shall rest in the state that gave to his country and to the world.

It is with deep regret that the secretary of the navy announces to the navy and to the marine corps the death of Hon. George Bancroft, formerly secretary of the navy. The long and honored career of Mr. Bancroft, his high character and the distinction which he achieved both in public office and in literary labor have made his name one of the most familiar and venerated in American annals. His successful administration of the navy department from March, 1845, to September, 1846, was marked pre-eminently by the foundation of the naval academy—an act which has earned for him the most profound and lasting gratitude of the naval service. As a mark of his respect to his memory it is ordered that the navy department be draped in mourning for the period of thirty days, and that all business be suspended therein on the day of the funeral.

FROM EMPEROR WILLIAM.

This morning J. C. Bancroft received the following telegram from the emperor of Germany, transmitted through the German legation in this city:

Sir,—His majesty, the emperor and king, remembering the relations of friendship which for many years existed between his majesty the late Emperor William and the late Hon. George Bancroft, as minister of the United States to Berlin, has directed me to express to you and to your family his most sincere sympathy with the great loss which has fallen upon you and upon your country.

In accordance with the expressed wish of Mr. Bancroft before he died, in which his family concur, there will be no military ceremonies in connection with his funeral, but the secretary of the navy and other principal officers of the department will attend his funeral in a body. Rev. Dr. Douglass of St. John's church will conduct the service, which will be held at St. John's at 11 a. m. to-morrow. The public will be admitted to the church, though a number of seats will be reserved for the president and his cabinet, the diplomatic corps and other high officials.

In the senate to-day Mr. Hoar made a motion, which was agreed to, that the adjournment to-day be till 12 o'clock to-morrow, in order to give senators who desired to attend the funeral of Mr. Bancroft an opportunity to do so.

He added that Mr. Bancroft was perhaps the most illustrious man of letters, with one or two exceptions, in the country. He had a peculiar relation to the people of the United States by reason of the fact that he was everywhere recognized as the great historian of the great eras of the foundation and achievement of American independence and of the formation of the constitution. Mr. Bancroft's name had been honored by the senate in a way in which no other name had been, by a special permission that he should be admitted to the floor of the senate at all times.

CAMP OF CONFEDERATES.

First Annual Dinner of the Order in New York.

NEW YORK, Jan. 20.—The first annual dinner of the Confederate Veteran Camp of New York at the New York hotel to-night brought together many prominent men from all parts of the Union.

This camp is said to be the first ex-Confederate organization north of the Potomac since the war. Covers were laid for 160 guests. The dining hall was elaborately decorated. Col. A. G. Dickinson, commender, made the opening address, and the following toasts were responded to:

"The Memory of Lee," Col. Charles Marshall of Baltimore; "Let Us Have Peace," Gen. Sickles; "The Confederate Veteran," Gen. William C. Oates of Alabama; "Our Country—The United States," Col. Charles T. O'Ferrall of Winchester, Va.; "The Soldier Journalist of '61—'65," Col. John A. Cockerill; "Our Old Home—The South," Hon. Benton McMillan of Nashville, Tenn.; "Our Soldier Dead," was drunk in silence.

The mention of the name of Gen. Grant brought forth cheer after cheer. His name was spoken with that of Lee, and alternate cheers were given for the memory of these two great generals.

Thomas A. Young sprang to a table and shouting at the top of his voice, said that he wished to pledge the energy of every member of the Ex-Confederate Veteran Camp to complete the monument of Gen. Grant. His sentiment was loudly applauded. The entire body arose and in silence drank the memory of this great general of the North.

Another agreeable surprise was the presence of Miss Winnie Davis, "the daughter of the Confederacy." She graced with her presence this first annual dinner of this Confederate veteran camp.

NOT TO BE SLIGHTED.

Some Coast Towns Dissatisfied With the Action of a Commission.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Jan. 20.—Senator Mitchell to-day introduced a resolution which may open up an interesting state of affairs in connection with the location of the site for a gun factory on the Pacific coast.

The commission appointed under an act of last session selected Benicia, near San Francisco.

Since that action was taken there has been complaint made that other cities on the coast were not given the attention that their merits warranted. Several places in Washington and Oregon, among them Seattle, Tacoma and Portland, through various organizations submitted evidences of their own desirability as sites, and for some reason or other little attention was given to these places.

Senator Mitchell's resolution asks the secretary of war to send to the senate copies of all recommendations and statements of boards of trade, chambers of commerce and other commercial bodies and municipal corporations presented since Oct. 1, either to the war department or to the military board, which have been submitted to show the commercial and military importance and other facilities of the several sites suggested to such board as proper for the purposes desired.

Helped by the Lymph.

PITTSBURG, Jan. 20.—About one month ago Dr. E. T. Painter, a well known local physician, sailed for Berlin, his object being to undergo a lymph treatment. To-day a letter was received from him, giving an interesting and technical account of his symptoms. The doctor was suffering from spinal tuberculosis and was carried on a stretcher. He writes that the treatment is heroic, but in his case successful. The third injection nearly killed him, but after the sixth he arose from his bed for the first time in months, and is now shuffling around a Berlin hospital, improving daily.

LOYAL INDIANS.

Report Made by Missionaries on the Situation at Standing Rock.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Jan. 20.—Four missionaries of the Catholic church, Rev. Fathers Konel, Marty, Strassmair and Gerschmyler, have written a letter to Secretary Noble, in which they give the Indian situation at Standing Rock, in North Dakota.

They say that some misleading reports have been sent out from that place. The majority of the Indians are well pleased with the action the government has taken through its agent to settle the difficulties. These men say the Indians manifest no dissatisfaction, but are glad at the result of the government's policy, and believe it will have a good effect in the future. The late decisive events showed that there are more well disposed, loyal Indians than had been supposed. The Indians at Standing Rock desire no change. They want Maj. McLaughlin retained as agent.

Since the flight of Sitting Bull's followers, many of whom have now returned, not an Indian, so far as known, has left the reservation, and all reports to the contrary are untrue.

Authority has been granted to Gen. Miles to transfer temporarily, as a military measure, the Northern Cheyenne band of Indians from Pine Ridge to Fort Keogh, Mont. This authority is granted by the secretary of war with the concurrence of the secretary of the interior. This has been thought to be necessary by Gen. Miles or the protection of the Cheyennes who have been serving as scouts against the hostile Sioux.

Senator Sanders to-day introduced a bill making it an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment for any person to sell or lend fire arms and ammunition to Indians.

KILLED AT THE CARD TABLE.

Masked Robbers Attack a Party of Poker Player.

HELENA, Mont., Special Telegram, Jan. 20.—McCartysville, the headquarters of the graders of the Great Northern extension, was the scene yesterday of a horrible and shocking affair. Three masked men entered a tent where five graders were playing poker, being attracted by the sight of about $700 which the men had on the table.

The graders were commanded to throw up their hands, and, upon refusing to do so, the robbers opened fire, killing two players outright and severely injuring the remaining one. The masked men secured what money was on the table and, hurrying outside, mounted horses and fled.

It was some little time before the alarm could be given, but as soon as the fact became known the entire camp turned out. Striking the trail of the murderous wretches the incensed graders followed it for about fifty miles, when all traces disappeared. Had the pursuers overtaken the robbers the murder of their co-laborers would have been speedily avenged.

A gang of thieves have been operating along the line of the extension for some time past, but have never made so bold a stroke as that of yesterday. The officials of the Great Northern in charge of the construction at that point have authenticated the report, and Sheriff Houston of Missoula county has been notified of the killing.

THOSE REFRIGERATORS.

The Raum Investigating Committee at Work Again.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 20.—The Raum investigation was resumed this morning. Assistant Secretary Bussey, of the interior department, testified that he did not now have and never did have any interest in the refrigerating company.

Bradley Tanner, Commissioner Raum's private secretary, testified that he was secretary and treasurer of the District of Columbia Refrigerator company, of which the Universal Refrigerating company is the parent company. No stock had ever been issued. The incorporators were Commissioner Raum, Mr. Bussey, S. Allett Kilbourn, Joseph Bishowski, Richard W. Tyler and himself.

Green B. Raum, Jr., was asked by Mr. Cooper the name of the man who took care of his horses. He replied that his name was O'Donnell; and when asked if the man was in the pension office, said: "That's none of your business."

The committee admitted the questions and Mr. Raum stated that O'Donnell was a messenger in the pension office at $70 a month. He had been appointed by witness' father. O'Donnell did his duty and attended to witness' two riding horses after office hours, for which witness paid him. He refused to tell the compensation, stating that it was none of Mr. Cooper's business.

HIS LIFE EBBING AWAY.

King Kalakaua Lying at the Point of Death in San Francisco.

SAN FRANCISDO, Jan. 20.—King Kalakaua of the Hawaiian Islands, is lying at the point of death at the Palace hotel here suffering from Bright's disease and urameia. Col. McFarlane, the king's chamberlain, stated to-night:

The king is very low and his illness is most alarming. The disease took a sudden turn for the worse this morning; and he has been in a semi-unconscious state ever since. For forty-eight hours he has been unable to take solid food, and is nourished with milk and brandy.

He is attended by Fleet Surgeon Wood, of the United States man-of-war Charleston, and Dr. Sawyer. The physicians are greatly alarmed and have held several consultations to-day with prominent physicians of this city. Rear Admiral Brown to-day sent a telegram to the navy department at Washington telling of the king's condition and the Hawaiian minister was notified by Consul General McKinley.

Tripp Behind the Bars.

HUDSON, Wis., Special Telegram, Jan. 20.—Officer S. Shortall of Stillwater and J. B. Jones of this city arrived here last night with Samuel Tripp, the notorious horse-thief who was captured Sunday at Minneapolis. They turned him over to Sheriff Donohue on the charge of stealing Frank Egloff's horse. Bashford & Disney, who are attorneys for the prisoner, attempted to liberate him to-day on a writ of habeas corpus, claiming the officers had no right to bring Tripp from Minnesota to Wisconsin without requisition papers. Judge Reed deferred decision on this point until Tuesday, and the preliminary examination was adjourned until Wednesday pending a decision on the writ question. Tripp has been in the Minnesota penitentiary thirteen years for various felonies.

Miles and Miss Miles, and Col. Thomas F. Barr. The theater was packed and the comedy achieved a great success.

WORK OF CONGRESS.

Proceedings of Both Branches of the National Legislature.

Saturday Jan. 10.

SENATE.

A bill was passed extending the time for entry of lands under the forfeiture bill of last session. The report on the bill to carry out the act to devide the Sioux reservation was agreed to. Debate on the financial bill was continued, Mr. Morgan concluding his speech.

The vice-president laid before the senate the protest of 23 members of the Idaho legislature against allowing Mr. Dubois to take his seat.

After some minor miscellaneous business the senate resumed consideration of the election's bill, Mr. Morgan speaking.

HOUSE.

In the house the army appropriation bill was made the subject of political speeches and was debated at length without action. Eulogies on the late Representative Walker of Missouri consumed part of the afternoon.

Tuesday, Jan. 13

SENATE.

The senate resumed the consideration of the financial bill and was addressed by Mr. Sherman.

After speaking nearly four hours Mr. Sherman resumed his seat amid considerable applause.

Mr. Morgan, on behalf of Mr. Colquitt, gave notice of an amendment to the financial bill, abolishing the tax on state banks.

Senator McConnell of Idaho made his maiden speech in the senate to-day and, of course favored free coinage. As a speaker he made a very favorable impression. He said that the people of the East must not look upon the Western men and Western representatives as enemies; that they were the brothers and sons of their constituents and were of the same general stock. He described the prosperity of his state and said the one thing lacking was money—money to move the products of their fields, forests and mines, and he believed that free coinage would be a movement in the right direction.

HOUSE.

The sub-committee on commerce had a hearing on the bill to regulate the size and running of rafts on the rivers connecting the big lakes which annually damage the navigation of these waters. The committee has agreed on a bill which will be reported in a few days that is believed will give satisfaction to all interested.

Mr. Demo of Houston moved that a committee of five on mileage be appointed, and the motion being carried, the speaker appointed Messrs. Greer of Wabasha, Bjorge of Otter Tail, Sikorski of Winona, Chesley of Norman and Currier of Blue Earth.

Wednesday, Jan. 14.

SENATE.

The senate received one of the greatest surprises it has ever had. At nearly 12 o'clock, after a long tedious discussion during the day, after voting on the various amendments to the financial bill and after the bill as amended had been reported to the senate and agreed to, Mr. Vest presented a free coinage bill pure and simple, as a substitute, and it was passed—29 to 27.

Both Senator Davis and Senator Washburn voted in the negative. Before the senate had fairly recovered from the surprise Mr. Hoar called up the elections bill in order to make it the unfinished business for to-morrow. The vote on this was a tie, and the viec president cast his vote in its favor. Senator Davis voted in the affirmative and Senator Washburn in the negative.

HOUSE.

The house passed the army appropriatio bill amended so as to provide that lan great railroads shall receive for army transportation but 50 per cent. of the price paid to them by private parties for similar services. The District of Columbia appropriation bill was carried into the committee of the whole and debate agreed upon, pending which the house adjourned.

Thursday, Jan. 15.

SENATE.

The silver bill as passed by the senate is a free coinage measure pure and simple, free from all the national bank and bond legislation contained in the financial bill. The senate disposed of considerable routine business, after which the election bill was taken up and Mr. Evarts spoke in advocacy of it. He sent to the clerk's desk and had read an extract from a speech made by Judge B. B. Chriman, in the Mississippi constitutional convention last September, denouncing the election methods as carried on in that state. That speech, he said showed that there was in Mississippi a prevalence of subversion of law. The constitution of Mississippi (he understood) provided that elections for, the lower branch of the legislature should be held once in four years—thus accustoming voters to the disuse of the suffrage. What Democratic community of the north would submit to that?

HOUSE.

Mr. Milliken, of Maine, submitted reports on the bills providing for the erection of buildings at Sioux Falls, S. D., and Portland, Oregon, which were agreed to.

The speaker announced the appointment of the special committee to investigate the "silver pool" question as follows: Messrs. Dingley, Paine, Rowell, Dockery and Oates. Mr. Dockery, however, has resigned, and Mr. Peel, of Arkansas, has been appointed in his place.

The conference report on the Mankato, Minn., bill was after debate agreed to. A message from the senate was received announcing the passage of the financial bill with a free coinage substitute. The reception of this message by the Democratic side was cordial and effusive, and Mr. Bland, of Missouri, expressed the hope that early action would be had upon the measure.

Friday Jan. 16,

SENATE.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17.—The fight over the election bill is now on in earnest in the senate.

Mr. Pasco started the ball to-day in a long speech against the bill and was followed by Messrs. Berry, Jones of Arkansas, Hampton and Reagan against the bill and Mr. Dixon in its favor.

Mr. Pasco gave notice of an amendment which he would offer, to punish bribery by the payment of money, or by the promise of procuring employment for voters, and to punish the use of pay envelopes intended to influence workingmen.

HOUSE.

There is considerable excitement in Swift over the arrival of a band of Indians at Norway lake. They are camped close by the graves of 14 people that were killed by the Sioux in 1862. It is reported that they have killed some cattle belonging to the farmers in that neighborhood. W. H. Merryman and O. Strom, two Kerkhoven business men, drove out to see them dance recently, and the Indians began hostile demonstrations at once, making them beat a hasty retreat.

At the annual meeting of the state agricultural society, held at St. Paul F. B. Clarke, of St. Paul, was elected as president for the ensuing year. The retiring president, F. C. Pillsbury declined a re-election. Mr. Pillsbury, speaking of last year's work of the society, said: There was no clash in the least at the last fair, and I take pleasure in congratulating the society upon its present and future prospects. We have endeavored, and I think succeeded admirably, in making this a purely agricultural institution. The annual report shows remarkably well, and in due time will be published. I would suggest that at future meetings of the society arrangements be made whereby tents may be provided in which farmers who so desire can live during fair week. This would save them much expense, and would be something of a novelty besides. There should also be some evening meetings during fair week at which agricultural topics should be considered.

The Douglas county commissioners are considering the possibility of proceeding against E. T. Carroll, late county superintendent of schools, for malfeasance in office, Just previous to turning the office over to his successor, Mr. Carroll destroyed all the data that had accumulated in the office during the past half-dozen years. In addition to this he failed to turn over two more of the records furnished him by the county. Whether he has made himself criminally liable is not yet known, but the matter will be investigated by the county attorney.

Arrangements are being made to fight the collection of all notes now held by harvester companies in this state, and it is said the amount is about $3,000,000. The ground of the contest is that the notes were given for binders with the contract that repairs should be furnished free, and the recent combine, the American Harvester company, has made a rule that all repairs must hereafter be paid for in cash. Another ground for the contest will be that the new company is a trust, and is therefore contrary to the laws of the United States and the statues of the state.

A Family Affair.

I was paying a call to the editor of a weekly paper in a town in Vermont, says an exchange, and, after looking over the editorial page of a copy on his desk, I remarked:

"You don't appear to have much to say about the party candidates."

"No, not much," he replied.

"But are they satisfied?"

"They have to be. It's pretty badly mixed around here."

"How?"

"Well, this is a Republican paper, but my son Nate, who is a Democrat, is running for state senator against the Republican candidate. I can't call Nate a horse-thief and a liar, you know, because it's in the family. If I come out and blow for the man, then it's agin Nate, so I sort o' keep still."

"How about sheriff?"

"Well, my brother Bill is running on the Democratic ticket, and while I can't help him any I don't want to hurt his chances."

"And prosecutor?"

"Then why don't you run a Democratic paper?"

MERRIAM'S MESSAGE

Gov. Merriam Delivers His Biennial Message to the Legislature.

He Reviews the Work of the last Two Years and Makes Some Suggestions.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Constitutional enactment permits me the opportunity of submitting to this body such facts and suggestions affecting the present condition of state affairs as are deemed worthy of consideration. Availing myself of this privilege, I shall first call attention to matters pertaining to general legislation, and later refer more specifically to such items as I regard of special importance. Permit me to reiterate the sentiment expressed in a communication to the legislature assembled two years ago as to the desirability of a careful scrutiny of all bills, the purposes and requirements of which call for the expenditure of public moneys. Too much care cannot be exercised in this direction. Let the taxes be kept at the lowest point consistent with prudent and wise administration. The penal and charitable institutions, as well as our public school system, should be supported in a manner worthy of the state and its citizens, but every demand for increased facilities, or enlarged expenses, should be carefully considered and aid only extended when absolutely needed. Further on I shall take the liberty of expressing my views as to what sums should be allowed the different institutions. The opinions offered are based upon a careful computation of the revenues to be derived from various sources during the coming two years.

Allow me to say that I regard as a great and growing evil, in connection with all legal enactments, both state and national, the tendency toward class legislation. It is too common an occurrence for localities, and for individuals, to demand of the law-making power action that will tend to their exclusive benefit. Laws should be passed that will bear upon and benefit equally all citizens, and the greatest care should be exercised that no advantage of any kind or character to the detriment of the general public be given to any special class, or to any particular locality. It is quite the custom among the many well-meaning citizens to ask of the legislature relief from every trouble, imaginary or real, many of the difficulties being from causes beyond its curative resources. All should be protected in their personal and property rights. Discrimination of any character that is to the advantage of one citizen and works injury to another should be studiously avoided as unfair, and not in accord with the spirit of free institutions. In this connection, too, I regard paternalism, so-called, in government, as an evil that will ultimately result in great trouble and endless confusion. It is a malady that seems to be spreading, and carried to its logical and legitimate conclusion will end in the building up of favored classes and localities, to the detriment of the great masses of the people. Your responsibilities in this direction are important, and I commend to your consideration the necessity of avoiding all legislation of the character I have noted.

RAILROAD AND WAREHOUSE COMMISSION.

The report of the railroad and warehouse commission gives full insight into the work that has been accomplished under the direction of that body during the past two years.

Since the passage of the law creating the present board the records will clearly demonstrate the fact that much has been accomplished that has been of direct benefit to the general public. Among other things, and important, has been the gradual but material reduction in transportation rates for freight and passengers, and such action as has resulted in requiring of the railroad companies equal consideration for all classes of shippers. We must not forget, however, that competition, improved methods in handling trains, newer and better macoinery, lower grades, and the reduced cost of transacting business, aided by a continually growing traffic, have all assisted in making lighter the burdens of transportation. To my mind one of the greatest evils incident to railroad management is the pernicious habit indulged in by too many railroad officials of discriminating in favor of certain patrons and against others. It is an abuse over which the public feel justly incensed. So manifestly unfair is it to give one shipper any advantage over another that, in calling attention to the matter, to simply state that the practice exists seems to be all that is necessary at this time. The penalties for disobedience of the section of the law referring to discrimination should be so severe as to administer a lesson to him who breaks it that they will not soon be forgotten. The commission, in its reports of 1885, and of later dates, speaks of a certain form of discrimination that is worthy of your consideration. I quote from these reports relative to the system so common among railroad managers of bestowing free passes: "It is the conviction of this commission that the issuing of free passes as now practiced in this state is an unjust discrimination as against every passenger that pays, and thus opposed to the spirit of the act passed for the regulation of common carriers; that it is a fruitful source of corruption; that it is injurious alike to public and private interests, and to the interest of the companies themselves, and that it is one of the chief obstacles in the way of proper and necessary reform in railway management and the control thereof under authority of the state." The present law regulating common carriers especially permits the issuance of passes for the free transportation of passengers, although all other discrimination is prohibited under severe penalties. Comment is unnecessary.

It is gratifying to state that those sections of the law requiring that cars shall be furnished to individual shippers have been carried into effect more fully during the last two years than at any time heretofore. While there have been individual cases where the railroad managers have been derelict in their duty in this respect, yet on the whole the spirit of the law has been met, and its provisions generally complied with.

The decision rendered in March last by the supreme court of the United States, holding that certain provisions of the act of 1887 regulating common carriers are not in harmony with the federal constitution, will make necessary some changes in our laws in this regard. It was generally understood when the law of 1887 was enacted, that while the railroads were entitled to receive reasonable rates for service rendered, the legislature was the sole arbiter as to what rates were reasonable. It was also generally admitted that this power could be delegated by the legislature to a board of commissioners. With this in view, the law of 1887, as interpreted by the supreme court of the United States, delegated this power to the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners, and provided no means for a review of its action. The court of last resort has determined that action upon such matters is not final, either in a commission or in the legislature itself. The power of the legislature to make reasonable rates for common carriers is not denied, but whether a given rate so made is reasonable is a judicial question, and must be settled as other matters of law and fact are determined, through the medium of the courts. The statutory provision of 1887 should be so amended as to provide a plain, direct and speedy method of review of the orders of the commission, either through the medium of appeals or by direct proceedings on application of the board, or of any party or corporation interested, to the supreme court of the state. Much can be done in the direction of reducing the cost of marketing our principal cereal at the terminal points when the amendment suggested is carried into effect.

GRAIN INSPECTION.

One of the important interests entrusted to the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners is the inspection and weighing of grain. I confess to approaching this subject with diffidence, as I am not entirely positive whether our present system is all that can be desired. The grading of wheat is not an exact science, but is largely a matter of individual judgment. Grain experts will not always agree, and as a result there is frequently a divergence of opinion between inspectors in the country and at terminal points of so marked a character as to produce much confusion and often dissatisfaction. I have addressed communications to many of the leading farmers of the state, as well as to some of the prominent receivers of wheat, and with practical unanimity they concur in the opinion that the law, in its present form, with possibly some slight amendments, is as effective as any enactment that can be devised for the purposes intended. Some suggest that a board of appeal be provided at each terminal point to adjust any question of grades arising in connection with inspection. This I deem to be a wise suggestion. The problem of grading at local stations is more difficult to solve. It would be impracticable to maintain state inspection at the thousand and one points throughout the state where grain is bought, and therefore it would seem as if the small shipper must avail himself of the right to ship his wheat direct to the receiving points and demand state inspection and weights in case he is dissatisfied with the inspection of the local elevator agent. I am well aware that many hardships arise from undergrading at country stations, but I see no way whereby this difficulty can be overcome save in the manner indicated.

AUSTRALIAN SYSTEM OF VOTING.

The last legislature enacted a law relating to the manner of voting and the holding of primaries in cities in this state containing 10,000 people or more, and a test of the plan (known generally as the Australian system) was made at the last general election. The law in the main worked satisfactorily, some minor changes being apparently necessary to perfect it. In my judgment the statute should be so amended as to make it applicable to the entire state, and I suggest for your consideration the desirability of causing such additions to the present laws as will accomplish that result. Public sentiment is fully alive to the necessity of throwing such safeguard about the ballot box as will insure purity in elections. No means should be spared to prevent fraud, intimidation, or corruption at the polls.

EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM.

Our whole educational system is so excellent, and rests upon so secure a foundation, that I hardly deem it necessary to enlarge upon it particularly. The excellent character of the work being done in the university, in the normal schools and in the high schools, is so generally known and appreciated as to require but little comment, other than words of highest praise. Some changes are needed in the direction of the management of the high schools of the state, as well as some additional appropriation to meet the natural growth incident to a rapidly increasing population. It would be well to enlarge the present high school board, consisting of three members, to five, the two additional to be selected, one by the board of regents, and one by the normal school board. The employment of a special secretary, who would devote his time to the inspection and improvement of the high and graded schools seems to me desirable.

Quite a number of graded schools might rank as high schools if the appropriation was increased $8,000 per year, and thus a very desirable result would follow a moderate additional expenditure. The sum of $400 is allowed each high school under certain conditions, and at this time the appropriation only provides for sixty. At least twenty-five additional schools should receive the aid of $400, as by this assistance they would grow into excellent institutions, and raise the standard of education in the counties where the are situated.

INSPECTION OF ILLUMINATING OILS.

At the last session of the legislature the law concerning the inspection of illuminating oils was amended, whereby the fee system was abolished and the position of inspector of oils made a salaried office, all emoluments arising from inspection being covered monthly into the state treasury. No appropriation having been made to pay his salary, the inspector deducted the amount due him under the provisions of the law each month from the fees collected. In March last, however, in a suit brought in the district court of Hennepin county by a company dealing in illuminating oils against the deputy oil inspector in that county, it was decided that the term "package" as used in the statute might refer to a receptacle for oil of any size, and that the vendor of oil was not compelled to submit to inspection by the barrel unless he so elected. The practical effect of the decision was such as to render it impossible to procure an inspector to serve who would be willing to accept the legal compensation for inspecting a "package" containing one hunhundred or more barrels at the rate of 40 cents, that being the maximum sum allowed by the statute. As a result, and if other temporary measures had not been taken, illuminating oils would have been sold broadcast over the state without inspection, endangering, possibly, human life and property. After consultation with the attorney general and the representatives of the large dealers in illuminating oils an arrangement was made whereby the companies dealing in and distributing oil agreed to pay the salaries of three inspectors until such time as the law could be amended to meet the case involved. This was undoubtedly the best plan that could be devised to meet the emergency. I respectfully urge upon you the necessity of prompt legislation in connection with this matter. Illuminating oil is very generally in use throughout the state, and provision should be at once made to avoid any calamity that might occur from a neglect to rigidly inspect the same. It might be well to consider the desirability of returning to the fee system, reducing the amount per barrel to ten (10) cents in accordance with the law in neighboring states. The public will be better served, and the perquisites after deducting the sum necessary to provide deputies to strictly enforce the law would not aggregate an excessive amount in view of the labor performed. From such information as I have at hand the number of barrels that are likely to be subject to inspection will not exceed 80,000 per annum in the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis. There would perhaps be 25,000 to 30,000 barrels to be inspected in other parts of the state, to be handled by local inspectors. After deducting necessary expenses of rigorous inspection in the two cities, it would leave between $3,000 and $4,000 as a salary to the chief inspector. Should it be deemed advisable to continue to pay a salary to the inspector, the amount should be provided for in the general appropriation bill.

THE NATIONAL GUARD.

I desire especially to call your attention to the efficiency and excellence of the National Guard. It is composed largely of young men from all parts of the state, many of them from the agricultural districts, who are devoting themselves with great earnestness and faithfulness to the manual training necessary to develope them into soldiers equal to any emergency. The reports of the adjutant general indicate a constant improvement in point of proficiency and drill and the other requisites for military service. It is well to have bodies of trained men for the purpose of protecting life and property should exigencies arise in the way of local disturbance; and in case of war with foreign countries, well trained officers could be selected as the basis of material for organizing an army from the ranks of the national guard. At present no provision has been made to furnish overcoats or blankets to the men, for use in case they are ordered out on duty in extreme weather. An appropriation for this purpose is manifestly a proper one, the articles purchased to remain the property of the state.

THE WORLD'S FAIR.

The world's fair to be held in Chicago in 1893 will be an event of national importance, and proper steps should be taken by the legislature to insure a full exhibit of the resources of our state upon that occasion. No means should be omitted to have the various advantages of Minnesota made known to the thousands who will visit the greatest exposition of modern times. It will be necessary in order that we may receive the attention commensurate with our wealth and population to make an appropriation adequate to the proper representation of our vast agricultural and mineral products, and to formulate such plans as will call the attention of visitors to our matchless climate, our educational system, and our manifold advantages in all that pertains to industrial and social life and development. It may be deemed wise to create a commission into whose charge this whole matter shall be entrusted. I consider this of special importance, and trust no means will be omitted to provide for a full and complete exhibit, as the results that will accrue cannot fail to be of lasting benefit.

WAR HISTORY OF MINNESOTA TROOPS.

The commission appointed under the act of April 16, 1889, to collate the history of Minnesota troops engaged in the late war, as well as the Indian war of 1862, has reported in full as to the work delegated to their care. The results of its labors have been eminently successful. The book published under its supervision has been largely circulated in accordance with the enactment. I desire to embrace this opportunity to express the obligations of our citizens for the faithfulness and diligence shown by the members of the commission in the fulfilment of a work of such interest to the people of our state.

SWAMP LAND GRANTS.

I respectfully urge upon this body the desirability of disposing of several unsettled swamp land grants. The state has granted from time to time, during the last twenty-five years, quite an amount of swamp lands to aid in the construction of various railroads. Some of the roads have selected nearly or quite the number of acres to which they are entitled. Others have preferred to delay, for one cause or another, until a large amount of unfinished business has accumulated in the land office, necessitating the employment of extra clerks and causing more or less expense. Some of the grants have have been forfeited by non performance of contract, while others await further legislation to determine rights. A sufficient number of acres have been deeded to the state by the general government to fill the grants to railroads (saving possibly one road), and state institutions whose rights have been fully determined. The time has now come for the lands to be deeded to the proper parties, and the state relieved of further annoyance and care. To that end I suggest that a law be enacted directing the parties entitled to land to select the same within a reasonable time, say three or five years, and after the expiration of that time to provide that all grants, of every kind and nature, be declared absolutely forfeited.

KANDIYOHI COUNTY PUBLIC LANDS.

Permit me for the second time to call the attention of the legislature to the necessity of making some disposition of the public lands in Kandiyohi county, amounting to some 6,400 acres, held for a capitol site. These lands should be sold and the proceeds turned over to the treasurer for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the state. There can be no possible advantage in retaining the lands longer and much benefit will result to the citizens of Kandiyohi county if these acres are made subject to taxation. Several attempts have been made to dispose of the matter, but all have been futile. The sum of $75,000 would be realized, it is estimated, from this source.

THE BANK EXAMINER.

The report of the public examiner gives in detail the result of the work accomplished in his department. Under the provisions of an act passed by the last legislature a large amount of work has been entailed upon the bank examiner in connection with the building and loan associations. I doubt very much the desirability of placing the various loan and building societies under state management unless the laws under which they are organized and regulated are uniform and more strict. It is an impossibility for state officers to properly look after institutions formed upon a business basis so insecure and be officially responsible to those who invest their savings. Many of the associations guarantee profits that are not obtainable if ordinary business methods are pursued, and proper care exercised in the way of prudent investments and economy in management. Building societies, founded upon right principles and conducted upon a safe and prudent basis, have proved remunerative investments, and in many instances have been of advantage to the community, but institutions organized for the purpose of providing large salaries for officers and directors, and conducted upon plans utterly foreign to well-known commercial rules, result in final disaster and loss to unsuspecting stockholders. If the state is to assume the guardianship of institutions of this kind let the law be so amended as to give the fullest opportunity to protect the public by means of ordinary safeguards. The work entailed upon this department is increasing so rapidly that some means must be devised to defray the expense of further clerical help. In order to meet this additional sum it would be well to collect of every bank, trust company or building and loan association a fee commensurate with the capital invested, to be paid into the state treasury. Quite an amount would be thus obtained to defray the expense of maintaining the office of examiner.

THE STATE FINANCES.

It is estimated that the excess of receipts over disbursements for the years 1892-93 will approximate $700,000. This sum will be available for purposes of enlarging and improving state institutions, and for other and necessary objects. The various boards and commissions have suggested expenditures that, if made, would involve an outlay of about $1,500,000. It will be impossible, under existing circumstances, in my judgment, to provide so large a sum of money. We are forbidden by law to create any further bonded debt, and it would be extremely unwise to increase the tax levy at this time. The times are not propitious for any additional burden in the way of direct taxes. I venture to suggest for your consideration the desirability of confining all appropriations for building purposes or extraordinary expenses to the sum above noted—$700,000. Attached to this paper is a full statement of the revenues to be derived from all sources for the next two years, as well as probable ordinary expenses. After a careful consideration of the demands made by the authorized boards representing the different penal, charitable and educational institutions I have indicated the direction, to the best of my judgment, all things taken under advisement, in which the money should be expended.

I need hardly refer, in conclusion, to your responsibility as the representatives of the people. You have accepted from the citizens of a great commonwealth no ordinary trust, and are charged with duties of the highest order. Not as individuals, but as the chosen servants of the people, you are to devise and formulate laws that will adequately protect the vast interests of the state. Permit me to express the hope that the results of your labors will prove of permanent value, to the citizens of Minnesota.

"Monsieur le General knows the family, then?" she queried. "Evidently he is French. Perhaps he was a kinsman—before the war?"

"No; scarcely that," Dale answered, with a smile at the distinction of dates. "But nevertheless I have a great desire to see Mme. Latour."

"For what?" asked the woman, bluntly.

The federal general gave her an amused stare—authority is rarely accustomed to questioning—but he smiled as he replied:

"N'importe! For curiosity, perhaps. I was at our military school with her grandson."

"Ah! mon Dieu!" cried madame, clasping her hands. "You are he! You are the General Dale! Mon Dieu! what a chance! On this day of all—— But what am I saying? Pardon, messieurs! Yes, yes, Monsieur le major. Now you wish the omelet, and then the gloria—no?"

And madame glided away hastily, but not without another suppressed "Mon Dieu!" and another long stare at the general.

This byplay was quite unnoticed by the others. Only one of them understood French, and he was hot in denunciation at the moment.

"Yes, sir! It's a shame! A d——d outrage!" the major was repeating, as he slammed his napkin down on the table. "Think of it, Everett—a whole army encamped here, and not an American to ride against Johnny Crapaud and John Bull for the honor of the old flag!"

"I had heard only vague mention of the race," Dale answered. "Is it strictly a gentleman's affair?"

"Oh, strictly. The challengers are tip top swells, and our general is the patron. I asked him yesterday if he wasn't ashamed of his subs. By Jove! but for that escopet ball I brought from Molino del Rey I'd try what the Q. M. D. could do when the line funked! Don't you see, Dale, that it is a national disgrace?"

"Scarcely," Everett answered with a laugh. "It seems to me a personal, not a military matter—assuredly not a national one. It is simply a question of taste."

"Extremely bad taste, too," put in the senior aid. "Had Mississippi and Red River service left us a decent mount the cavalry brigade would take up the gauntlet."

"Is it a steeplechase, or only over hurdles?" Everett asked quietly.

"Combination," said the major. "Hedge, ditch and rails, besides a water jump that will test most horses. By Jove! Dale, if you have a beast that is fit lend him to one of these boys for the honor of the flag!"

"Are you sure there will be no other entries?" the junior asked earnestly.

"Certain of it," responded the major. "The light battery men make excuse in condition of their horses; the infantry don't care to enter—afraid of their riding, I suppose."

And whether for the reasons given or not, it was a singular anomaly that no army man was entered in the race. This was an international challenge for gentlemen riders over the famous Metairie Jockey club course, on Monday, the eve of Carnival day. The challenge was open to the world, and the general commanding patronized the race. Later, affairs of similar character were run under the auspices of the Jockey club; but thus early in reconstruction days that body had not reorganized regularly, nor were its sympathies peculiarly enlisted in sporting matters.

The challengers were staff captain the Count de Chavirac, of the French army, and Baron Heros von Schlegen, of the German lancers. The accepters entered were Ensign Manuel de la Vega, of the Mexican cavalry, and Capt. Mandeville Hoyne-Cecil, of the British lifeguard.

Higher class New Orleans was not overgiven to mirth in those days. But it may be surmised that many a quiet smile moved black mustaches at the posture of the younger army men; and that more than one shapely pair of shoulders shrugged contemptuously at allusion to "ces betes Yankies!"

Still the absence of an American rider scarcely lessened the general interest in the race. The names of the contestants were well known; preliminary practice had shown the men and their mounts well matched. Already such Creole ladies as elected to grace the occasion wore the green and gold of the Mexican, the red and red of the Briton, the tricolor of the France, or the red, black and blue of Prussian.

But the United States colors, like the Roman patrician families, fulgebant absenti!

"You did not answer the major's suggestion, general," said Capt. Arnold with quiet voice but eager eyes. "Do you not think that some of us owe it to the brigade to do something?"

Only from French hands comes the omelette au rhum a possible perfection; the eggs beaten just enough and done to the very turn, the sugar sprinkled by neither prodigal nor miser, the rum old, pure, strong, but with not one suspicion of twang.

The tough old major touched the match to the amber fluid with the pride of the artist. As the blue flame flickered up the hideous, red daubed white mask of a Pierrot peered round the rear screen.

Without moving madame spoke three words to her husband, rapid as flash of a rocket, with something of its crackle in their consonants. The gumbo carried no sense to the best educated ears near, but the nominal head of the house promptly formed on the major's left, dressed on the omelet and stood at "attention!" while madame quietly and swiftly passed behind the screen.

And it was Pietro who a few moments later served the crown of the breakfast—the gloria a la Creole—placing four lumps of sugar in a shallow silver vessel, saturating them carefully with cognac and watching that they melted without burning. Then he ladled just the proper quantity, still aflame, into the cups, half filled with boiling amber fluid. For the cafe noir of the Creole is never black, and through it one may read the date upon a dime.

"Aha! That's brandy!" gurgled the major, with a deep, long sniff. "The soul and heart's blood of a grape in every drop! By Jove! sprinkle that on the cobbles yonder and a vineyard would spring up!"

And with the aroma of that gloria the party moved to the door, took rein from the blue statues of orderlies and clattered off. A block below Everett excused himself.

"There is a visit I must pay this morning," he said. "And mass is long since over."

And Pietro Bartol had followed to the door, all loyalty and bows, but as they rode off into the pleasant sunshine his face changed like a flash, while evil light glowed in the eyes.

"Curses on your race and kin!" he muttered savagely, but in the purest French. "Curse you and your flag for the woe it has wrought on us and ours! True was it when I said I was loyal!—no rebel! But not loyal to tyrants—robbers like"— But even as he raised his clinched hand the fiery gleam in the old man's eyes changed to singular shrewdness, and a grim smile twitched the gray mustache as he added with a deep shrug:

"But they pay well, and gold is a novel sight—a pleasant sight! Bah! The world moves, and one must move with it who would live! And now for our boy!"

He turned into the house. The Pierrot sat at a table commanding full view of the officers' table, dropping the opal absinthe from a spoon's tip absently. He rose and lounged lazily after Pietro behind the screen. Then his whole manner changed; the tall form erected, and with firm, soldierly stride he passed up the narrow back stair into madame's own apartment.

"How slow she is! It is a half hour since she went!" he muttered, as he bolted the door and tossed the hideous mask aside, revealing the features of Adrien Latour.

Deeply tanned, and not unfurrowed by the sharp plough of anxiety, the face was handsome as before—a thread or two of silver showing in the drooping mustache, and about the temples the frost that early touches the black hair of the Southron. But the imperious eyes softened as he slowly paced the room, muttering to himself—

"Dear old Dale! How natural he looked! If I had only dared to risk—But I will meet him, before I sail, if the whole Yankee army gets between us!"

A light step on the stair, a light tap on the door, and the man grasped his mask, only to toss it aside again at the low whisper—

"Mon fils, c'est moi!"

He shoved back the bolt. Mme. Pietro, flushed by haste and panting from excitement, stood in the entrance. Drawing up her tall figure, she placed tender hands upon Latour's shoulders and earnestly gazed upon him.

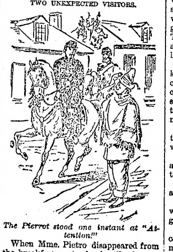
"And maman?" he asked eagerly.

She pushed back the whitening hair from his brow, kissing it as he had been a child, as she answered—

"Not quite yet, mon enfant. He is there!"

PART II—CHAPTER II.

TWO UNEXPECTED VISITORS.



The Pierrot stood one instant at "Attention!"

When Mme. Pietro disappeared from the breakfast party she hastily threw a veil like wrap about her head and passed rapidly through the paved court into the narrow street. Not slackening her pace, she turned several abrupt corners, and at last paused, breathless, before a small postern in the rear wall of one of the oldest houses in that quarter, lifted the cumbrous latch, but bolted the gate inside after entering. Crossing the large garden, she passed through the deserted kitchen and broad, dimly lit hallway, and ascended the wide stairs. At their head she encountered a tall, angular mulatress, erect, but seamed with age, her head scrupulously tied in the most flaring of Madras turbans.

To her Mme. Pietro spoke a few words in gumbo French, and, not pausing for a reply, passed to the lofty front drawing room on that upper floor. At the door she paused.

The room showed what had been luxurious elegance; but every piece of furniture, every ornament, the very pictures on the walls, were of another age. Scrupulously neat, the ancient woodwork glistening from recent rubbing and the faded brocades showing time, not wear, this salon might have been transported intact from the Quartier St. Germain and set down in New Orleans for all that showed it belonging to America or today. The old wrought silver sconces held wax candles under their glass shades; rare portraits of soldiers and diplomats in full dress, and of Watteau like ladies in directoire gowns, gazed down out of forgotten-era frames; there was no carpet, and the polished floor, black with age and oil, had its bareness relieved by heavy rugs at intervals. Exquisitely worked wax flowers stood under glass ovals on the high mantelpiece, under which the towering andirons of shining brass, topped by hideous griffins resting on their paws, would have delighted the inmost souls of les plus nouveaux riches in New York's most envied coterie.

But while heavy, semi-tropical odors from the great garden below floated into the wide windows, not one living flower broke the archæological rigor of this salon. Bouquets are of today; the system here was of a century gone.

And so was the sole occupant of the apartment; for madame—as all the world, save one, called Mme. d'Auvigne Latour—had seen fifteen years of it when the Reign of Terror added the guillotine to the refinements of civilization. She was then at school in Paris, and well she remembered the murder by the mob of her cousin, the Chevalier Anatole Marie d'Auvigne, while attempting to save from insult at their hands his royal mistress, the Austrian.

Far above the average height, and with erect, stately carriage of her spare figure, madame's severely classic face was scarcely more wrinkled than most women's—especially most Frenchwomen's—at half her years. The once black hair was now worn in snow white masses, a la Pompadour, brushed well back from the broad forehead; but the thin, arched eyebrows over the still brilliant gray-brown eyes were of a jetty black that gave peculiar power to the calm, grave face. Aquiline nose, thin, firmly set lips and long, oval lines of jaw all aided this characteristic; and strength of physique, as well as of character, was indicated by madame's every movement.

She sat erect in a carved back chair reading a comedy of Moliere, and she read it without spectacles. Glancing up from her book to Mme. Pietro she welcomed her with a slight gesture.

"Enter, my child," she said in a clear, pleasant voice that had little echo of eighty-eight years in its vibrance, and using the singular personal of familiar address. "Thou art always welcome to the old home, although thou dost make thy visits so rare that one might imagine I had never forgiven thee for marrying thy brown wolf and leaving my service."

"Ah, madame, what else was I to do?" deprecated the lady of the Green Perch. "One must marry some time, though, mon Dieu! I did wait somewhat late. And I well knew that Pietro was not one to bring into such a household as ours." And the landlady drew herself up proudly at the memory of where she had once belonged. "But madame knows that her old fille de chambre never forgets madame's goodness; that Clemence loves her and hers with a great love forever!"

"And hers!" echoed the grand dame, more by motion of the lips than by words. "What of hers is left? Ah! well, Clemence, I know that well. Thou wast ever devoted to me and to my boy."

"Oh, madame," the old servatrice cried out, bubbling over with her news, "I have a surprise for you—a delight! He—our Adrien—is well! He is—is coming home! Ah! mon Dieu! Madame, do not excite yourself, but he will be here before long—perhaps—pray, madame, be calm!—perhaps to-morrow!"

"He is here," madame answered calmly, but rising and facing the other with eyes aglow. "Try not to deceive me, Clemence. Joy never harms. But why has he not come? He is not ill; thy looks tell me that. Then why has he not come to me?"

"There is danger, madame. He has escaped from Mexico, where his party was defeated. He fears he is dogged by spies; but he will come at once. Advantaged by the carnival, he is disguised, and I have come to warn you. The Maison Bartol was full of Yankees, and one was that General— Mon Dieu! hear that!"

A loud clanging rap of the ancient knocker resounded at the street door, cutting Mme. Bartol's speech in twain, on lips still opened to listen. "No, no," she added as the firm tread of the mulatress resounded from the hall below; "'tis not he; for he will come by the postern."

There was a parley at the door below; then the mulatress came up the stairs with a card upon her silver salver.

Madame read the card—first silently and then aloud, accenting strongly both the title and the name:

"Gen. Everett!—read the rest," she added to Mme. Pietro. "It is English!"

The other read, translating as she went: "commanding first cavalry brigade, Army of the Mississippi."

"Truly am I honored," madame said, coldly. "I have so few visitors among my own people, yet the Yankee sends me his generals of brigade! Listen, Felicite." She turned to the servant, a slight flush rising about the high cheek bones. "Say to this person that Mme. d'Auvigne Latour has ceased receiving visitors since a foreign army occupies her country."

"Pray, madame, hear me but one moment!" cried the lady of the inn. "This is he—the other one—our Adrien's friend, of whom he speaks always—Dale Perch and of its master escaped under a portiere as Dale Everett entered the drawing room and bowed low to the grandmother of his friend.

Madame stood erect on the panther skin before the Erard upright that had not sounded a note in a decade. The rich folds of a black silk gown fell from her tall figure in graceful lines, while the calm, clear face and grand head, crowned only with nature's best coronet, would have coerced respect from a far less delicate intuition than her visitor's.

There was a pause.

"I am much honored," madame began— "But perhaps monsieur the American general does not speak the language. In that case, Felicite"——

Dale raised his eyes. They chanced to catch the reflection in the oval mirror over the mantel of the mulatress keeping watch and ward in the hall way, with all the ease of an artilleryman on picket.

"Pray proceed, madame," he answered in excellent French, emphasizing the familiar title. "I have passable knowledge of your beautiful language. Adrien was my room mate for years."

Madame's face softened to almost beauty at the tone in which Everett pronounced the name so dear to her.

"I well know that," she answered gently. "He has often told me of it. But I was about to ask"—and the loving woman became the grande dame once more—"to what fortunate chance I owe it that monsieur the general should have done me the honor of this visit?"

The perfect courtesy of the speech Dale could not question, but the intimation beneath it slightly disconcerted him. Besides madame still stood erect before him, and had not suggested that he be seated. He had heard since boyhood of the magnificent hospitality of the south—of her genial reception of all bringing credentials. Could it be that that bitterness of the conquered against the conqueror of which he had heard so much was active in the heart of this venerable and evidently loving woman? Could she deem it disloyal to take the hand of the man who had been more than brother to her only descendant? All this passed through his mind like lightning; for almost without pause he answered:

"The honor, madame, is wholly mine; yet I had not dared to claim it without two other motives. The first, a selfish one, is to ask your latest news of the gallant, noble gentleman whom I love as my own brother. He was well and happy when you last heard?"

Madame's face glowed as Dale spoke, and the proud eyes softened almost to a moisture as she answered:

"You are generous and true to speak such words, monsieur; though my Adrien deserves well the love you give him. Yes, he was well—very well, and"—suddenly her tone grew cold and proud—"the Maj. Gen. Latour could never be happy while his country is trod by the feet of foreign armies."

"But, madame, all this is in the past. He can return safely—honorably. I myself will give him parole. The war is over."

"Is it so, indeed?" The old Creole's eyes glowed, though the voice was calm and resonant. "It is then in the past that our land was laid waste, our loved ones slaughtered, our property wrested from us! The war is over when armed men sit in the seats of our judges and bayonets rule the courts!—when Louisiana's sons are free to come to their own homes—on parole! Monsieur le General, you mean kindness, but you cannot comprehend the Creole heart! When the Maj. Gen. Latour, of the army of the Confederacy, walks beneath his own roof tree, with head erect and eye that asks permission of but one Master—only then will these old arms open to take him to this heart. When he comes otherwise may the good God grant that this heart shall have ceased to beat!"

There was no excitement in the tone, no suspicion of vaunt in the words. Both bore the stamp of the deepest intensity, of conviction that had become religion.

So Dale Everett recognized it, and his justly balanced nature, from his victor's standpoint, comprehended in part the vastness of that sudden collapse of an idolized cause in its moral no less than military aspect. And here especially there was a grandeur about the stately old Frenchwoman, whose intense truth to her race won his respect, even while it jarred on his stanch loyalty.

"I had hoped, madame," he answered, quietly, "that we might avoid, even were it impossible to forget, the gulf across which I sought the honor of this interview. It has been a great privilege to me to hear of the dearly beloved friend of my boyhood. But my second object in coming was rather a matter of business."

"Of business?" Madame's tone was one of genuine surprise.

"Yes, madame—relative to your river plantations, which"——

"Which were stolen from us last autumn. Then Monsieur le General must understand that the agent of our family attends to such affairs."

Everett smiled slightly under shelter of his yellow beard. "Uncompromising old aristocrat!" was what he thought; but he said:

"There were some little points connected with this case which I thought your agent might not explain so clearly as myself. I therefore took that liberty, madame, and not to weary you with details an order has been issued by the general commanding to reinstate your managing overseer, together with the cotton already baled and now in the gin houses."

"Monsieur has truly placed the family of Latour under deepest obligations," the old lady responded with stately simplicity. "It is not so independent as once, and the restoration of so much that was wrongfully taken is indeed important. Adrien will rejoice at such fresh proof of your affection, monsieur, and I shall at once speak with him concerning it."

"Speak with him!" Dale exclaimed, surprised into abrupt query. "Is he here? Do you expect him?"

The grandmother had met a check and fallen back in confusion, but the grande

From the Thirteen Towns.

A large and enthusiastic meeting was held yesterday afternoon at Peterson's Hall by the voters of the Thirteen Towns for the purpose of discussing the quesfion of county division. Everybody was invited to participate in the discussion, and a large number of theose present availed themselves of the opportunity of expressing thir views on this subject. It was almost the unanimous sentiment of those present that the county should be divided as soon as possible and a county seat located somewhere in the east end of the county. The principle objection raised to the division was that of the fear that the taxes would be largely increased, but this feeling of alarm was generally overcome before the meeting adjourned.

From the Mississippi Valley Lumberman.

On the White Earth reservation C. A. Smith & Co. have contracted with the Indians for 8,000,000 feet of dead and fallen timber at $4.50 per thousand. The work is to be done in the vicinity of Lake Winnebigoshish, and the only white men in any way connected with it are a foreman and a cook. In the vicinity of Red Lake Falls 10,000,000 feet of similar timber is to be got out of the woods by another crew of Indians to fill a contract that they have made with P. & J. Meehan of Milwaukee, the contract price being $6 per thousand. A third piece of work which the Chippewas have now in progress is the filling of a contract at White Earth with T. B. Walker of Minneapolis for 2,000,000 at $6 per thousand.

No Danger There.

ST. HILAIRE, Jan. 25.—Stories of the trouble on the Red lake reservation continne to come in and denials follow them. Col. Benton, on the governor's staff, came in tonight and said:

"I interviewd Casper Falk, an old Indian trader, a man who knows every Indian on the reservation, and he is of the oponion that there is no danger whatever. He says that he has not heard of any Sioux Indians or Canadian Indian being on the reservation, and also stated thot there were very few Indians indulging in the dances. He is sure that they mean no harm and are only having a good time. I also had an inteview with Chief Moose-dung, the chief of the Indins of this part of the reservatin. He says there were no Sioux or Canadian Indians among his band, and that there was not exceed 75 Indians, including squaws and papooses on this part of this reservation. He seemed greatly amused when asked why they were dancing, and said they were dancing for fun. He also said that they did not want to get into trouble with the whites, as the Chippewas had been friendly since the days of their grandfathers, and that they would not fight unless compelled to do so. I am sure that there will be no trouble and that the settlers will return to their farms and all will be quiet in a day or two without any out side help. The farmers on the border of the reservation have been stealing some timber lately, and I hear that the Indians have been trying to stop them and may have made some threats which may have caused the present scare. Gen. Mullen is still here, and is fully convinced there will be no trouble, but will take necessary precautions to make the people safe."

A Wonder Worker.

Insanity of Millionaires.

The increased strain put on a money making man at the present time, especially if he be engaged in speculation, is some thing tremendous. Time was, that the very rich people were either those who had inherited a goodly fortune, or those who hah accumulated wealth by long years of sterdy devotion to business. Then, too, a millionaire was a wonder; now anything short of five to twenty million puts a man out of the category of "the rich." Under the present cocditions, every faculty must be constantly under whip and spur, and dangerous nervines are often rescrted to. No wonder there are so many cases of death from "heart failure" among the millionaires. The way to avoid this, is to cease so much making haste to be rich, to know when one is comfortable well off and to select the luxurious trains of "The Burlington" when about to make a journey either for buisness or pleasure. Information about rates and routes to all points, can be obtained from agents of this or connecting lines, or by writing to W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agent, A. B. & N. R. R., St. Paul, Minn.

Married.

PRATT—ZAISER—At Red Lake Falls, Minn., Jan. 2[illegible]th, 1891, by Rev. O. H. Elmer, of Crookston, at the bride's home, Mr. John G. Pratt, of Grafton, N. Dak., to Miss Polly Zaiser, of this city.

Cards had previously announced to the friends of the contracting parties the event above chronicled Miss Zaiser, the bride was one of Red Lake Falls' favorite daughters and numbered her friends here by the score. Mr. Pratt is a passenger conductor on the Great Northern. The wedding was private, the recent affliction of the family having barred the carrying out of the grand festivities previously planned; but many friends, though not present in person were represented by gifts. The number of presentations were unusually large, and many were of great beauty and value. The happy couple departed Tuesday morning for Grafton, N. D. where they will make their home. May comfort and happiness ever attend them.

Success and Advertising.

The merchant or manufacturer who does not advertise his goods cannot succeed. Of late newspaper advertising has become a distinct trade in itself, and all over the country leading concerns pay fabulous prices for men who are skillful in writing catchy advertisements. In many large cities there are men earning from $3,000 to $10,000 a year writing advertisements. This fact in itself shows advertising pays.

If people interested in this subject will investigate it for themselves they will find that the leading advertisers in the Plain Dealer are the merchants who have the best stores, the best assortment of goods, and who sell at the most reasonable prices. Such merchants do a much larger business than merchants who do not advertise; consequently they turn their goods over more quickly and can afford to give better prices. Close buyers appreciate this. What is the moral? He who advertises the most judiciously succeeds the best, and the buyers who seek the best bargains patronize such merchants.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

One More.

At noon the smaller scolars attending the Badger school procured several dynamite cartridges that had been [illegible] left in a vacant building near by. The boys played with these deadly toys until their mirth received a sudden check by the violent explosion of this cartridge, with the result above stated. Dr. Lemieux attended the boy, and will doubtless save the remainder of the hand, though it is badly lacerated.

A VOUDOO STORY.

IT was the doctor who told the story.

We were sitting in the dusk on the wide gallery of Mme. Dunbarrier's villa at Bay St. Louis. Dinner was just over and madam was reflecting with inward satisfaction that Litine, her Creole cook, had really surpassed herself—the crawfish bisque had been perfection itself, the river shrimp, boiled in red-pepper water, was still a fine delight to be remembered, au reste it had been a round table with only the friends she liked best—men old enough to appreciate a good dinner, and women pretty enough to almost distract one's attention from the menu.

"Mon dieu," madam was wont to say, with a shrug of her shapely shoulders, "one is imbicile to invite boys to dine, they only eat, and a dinner without a pretty woman is meat without grace."

Coffee and a flask of amber liquor had been served out on the gallery as we sat watching night come across the water. The sweet south wind lifted the veil of moss on the trees, and in the dusk we could see the white-sailed schooners, like phantom ships, coming in or going out. Some one lit a cigarette and laughed softly—the servant comming out to remove the coffee-cups had seen the pale crescent of the new moon through the tree-tops and had stopped to cross herself to ward off the bad luck such a misfortune was sure to bring. It was such a familiar mingling of the Christian symbol with heathen superstition that we scarcely noticed it until the doctor said:

"Do you know that is one of the most interesting psychological problems in the world—how far nature and heredity have been overcome by education and civilization?" and then speaking almost as if to himself, and lighting one cigarette from the ashes of another, the doctor told this story to illustrate his point:

"I hardly remember when or where I first met Loyette," he said, "it was so many years ago. But when I think of her I always see a tall, dark, little woman with clear olive skin, with black hair hidden under a gay tignon and eyes with such a tawny light in them—such flashes of passion, of love or hate—it made you think of a summer night when the soft darkness is cleft in twain by sudden gleams of lightning.

"You would have noted all these things if you had known her, but what you would have remembered longest would have been a curious impression of strength and power in her, repressed and dormant perhaps, but you instinctively felt that the slim, straight figure could spring on an enemy out of a doorway like a tiger on its prey, and that the long sinewy fingers had a grip like steel. You had only to note the thin line of the quivering nostril and the quick light that leaped into the eye to know that she was a creature of fierce passions, under which she shook and writhed like a reed in a storm.

"You may have seen many another quadroon like Loyette in the lower part of New Orleans, walking with their peculiarly free and swinging step along the banquette, or making picturesque bits of color among the fruits and bizarre wares of the French market, or better still, you may have seen them in the old St. Louis cathedral prostrate before the altar of Our Blessed Lady, with all the passion in their half-savage blood died out before the calm gaze of infinite purity, and their tempest-tossed souls at rest for a moment on the bosom of God." The doctor paused a moment, and then he went on:

As I have said I hardly remember how or when I first knew Loyette. I have a faint recollection of my father who was a sugar planter on the Teche dying, of being carried faint and griefsick to my guardian's house in New Orleans, of exchanging the light and freedom of the country for darkened rooms, of hot and narrow streets in place of waving cane, and then darkness closed in about me and I knew no more. They told me afterward I was very ill for weeks, but at last when that mysterious voyaging of mind and soul over unknown seas which we call delirium, was over, and like a half-wrecked bark I had drifted into port again, the first thing I remember consciously was Loyette. She was standing at the window, as I saw her so often in other years—tall, statuesque and still as if carved in bronze. I stirred softly, and seeing I was awake and rational, she came swiftly to me.

" 'Eh, mon bebe,' she said softly, 'but it is you who should burn a candle to the saints. It is the grace of le bon Dieu, or else it would be in the cemetaire St. Louis you would wake.'

" 'In my weakened state I did not greately care, but curiosity was beginning to stir in my numbed brain.

" 'And you,' I asked, 'who are you?'

" 'Oh,' she answered, with a shrug, 'as for me, I am Loyette, your nurse. Now, sleep, sleep, and she held to my lips a draught I unresistingly swallowed; but even as I drifted off into unconsciousness I was haunted by the dark, sad face that bent above me.

"In the days of convalescene, when I tossed from side to side of the great testered bed, lonely enough would I have been but for Loyette, who told me a hundred stories of the past and sang for me the gay chansonettes of her race in the sweet negro voice that somehow always seems to have a minor chord even in its gladness. Sometimes, but not often, she spoke of her children, dead long years ago, and with a passion that half frightened me she would snatch me to her bosom, trying vainly to feel with other childish hands the hungry mother love of her heart.

" 'I had eight chillen,' she would say, 'eight chillen, en dey's all dead. My God, eight little ones en not one lef' to me. Dey died, my babies, firs' one en den anuder, en Francois he live to be grown, so tall, so straight, so strong, en one day dey bring him home from de river, dead like de res.' Look,' she would exclaim passionately, 'it was not de little ones dat died, it was me; my body, my heart, my soul! It was so long ago,' she wailed, 'ev'rybody forget. But me—I am a mother; I do nothin' but remember.'

"In the years in which we dwelt under the some roof a strange intimacy and friendship grew up between the old slave and myself. I knew her griefs and shared her sorrows, but above all I knew the perpetual warfare her soul waged with superstition and fears that were as much a part of her existence as her dusky skin. Like most negroes belonging to Creole families she was a Catholic, but her religion, like the white blood within her veins—I believe I told you she was a quadroon—did not break the bonds of slavery or superstition, and there were times when, impelled by some blind instinct she was powerless to resist, she would slip away and join the voudoo worshipers in their horrible and mysterious rites. After such backsliding there would be such passionate repentance followed by such penance as only a strong soul can inflict on itself. She would scourge herself until the knotted cord was stained with blood, and kneel prostrate through the whole night before Our Lady of Perpetual Mercy.

"But days, perhaps, weeks or months afterward the old restlessness would begin to stir within her, the mysterious barbaric inheritance of a nature to which the Christian religion appealed but faintly, and then some morning she would slip stealthily into the courtyard worn, haggard, wild-eyed, with her gown half torn from her and stained with the dark, dank mud of the swamp. I knew only too well that she had yielded to the old resistless impulse and had found her way to the hidden recess of the swamp, where the voudoo fire gleamed amid horrid vapors for its votaries, where the deathly breath of the marsh enfolded them and loathsome reptiles glided away, fold upon fold, from the little band of half-naked men and women dancing before the fire in horrible abandon. I knew that Loyette's lips had been smeared with human blood, that she had sworn an oath to do the behests of her religion, so terrible the very memory of it blanched her cheek, and that did she but repeat one word the voudoo queen uttered as she stood upon the boy in which the sacred serpent writhed, her life must pay the penalty.

"What alterations of horror and attraction, what hopes and fears the Christian religion and this dark faith held for the poor creature none might know. Her soul was like an angel standing by the gates of paradise. Sometimes it yearned with unutterable longing for the light, and again, like a thing of night, it sounded the abyssess of darkness.

"Finally there came a time when, after one of these orgies, Loyette appeared the next morning so haggard and with such a wild, hunted look in her eyes that even her dull mistress noticed it.

" 'But it was nothing,' Loyette protested. "She was not well. She had an ague. A tisane of orange leaves would cure her, but she would not lie down.' "

The doctor paused in his story. The night seemed to have grown suddenly dark and chilly, and we drew more closely together as the narrator resumed.

"The day passed, but the next morning the city rang with the report of a terrible murder. A man, a slave, had been found murdered near the Old basin—murdered and horrible mutilated. The lips were cut off and the heart torn from out of the body. The community was aghast.

" 'Tiens,' it said, holding up its hands in horror, 'but he was a fiend—the assassin.'

"No clew could be found, no motive assigned for the deed. Robbery? A slave? it was absurd to suggest it, but there was something tigerish in the hate that not only slew but tore the heart out of the victim, there was something so dramatic even in the cutting off the lips that they might frame no accusing speech, that the murder was the one topic of speculation. Tired at last of the gruesome subject I climbed the stairs that led to Loyette's room. She was very ill. Her eyes burned with a strange fire, and it needed not my professional knowledge to see that she was sick unto death.

" 'You have heard'—she began, eagerly, as I entered the room.

" 'They should not have brought such horrors here,' I answered, but she intertupted me—

" 'Hush,' she commanded, 'who knows about it if not me? Look, I am dying. It killed me, too. He was a traitor en must die, en de lot fell on me. I killed him, there by de ol' basin. My God, he come along singin', singin'. I stan' in de dark, it was only a minute, so. His blood run down on my han', hot like fire. But see, little one, if it killed me, too? If I give my life, if I give my heart for his hear, my soul for his soul, how then?

" 'Hush, hush,' I cried, thinking she raved in delirium, think now of the little children who used to play about your knee. They are coming very swiftly to you, my poor Loyette.'

"She raised herself on her pallet. Her face, on which the dampness of death had already begun to gather, broke into a smile of ineffable tenderness. She stretched out her long sinewy arms, and then her arms fell at her side and the light died out of her face.

" 'Ah, no,' she moaned, 'they will not come to me, my hands are red with blood.'

"She rocked herself to and fro in inconsolable misery; occasionally a deep sigh broke across her lips

" 'Eh, mes pauyies pitis sans maman,' she wailed.

(My poor little ones without a mother.)

"Toward night, thinking that he who had listened so often to the sorrows of this burdened heart, knew so well its weakness, its temptations, its ignorance, its fears, might comfort her, I sent for the little priest who confessed her. He came, and through the long night knelt by that lowl couchy praying for the soul about to voyage with all its guilt and sin into the unknown, and just as dawn broke and the last breath quivered over the pale lips he laid the crucifix upon her breast, and raising his hands to heaven, cried in the words of the All-pitiful:

" 'Father, forgive them, they know not what they do.'

"And so Loyette died, clinging with trembling hands to the crucifix, but next her heart, wound with endless filaments, was the voudoo charm, and under her mattress was the knife, still red with the blood she had shed at the behest of her barbaric religion.

"Did, at the end, some word of divine light break across that darkened soul, or at the last supreme moment did the forces of nature and heredity claim their own?" The doctor turned to us with his question.

But we could not answer. The mystery of death, the awful mystery of the soul lie beyond human fathoming or conjecture.—Elizabeth M. Gilmer in the Nashville American.

COURAG . SAVED HER LIFE.

A Young Woman Hangs Beneath a Trestle as a Train ThundersPast.

This was the dire predicament in which Miss Norma Onken, of Ridsway avenue, Avondale was placed one afternoon, and it was only due to her cool judgment and calm presence of mind that she did not meet with a shocking death. In attempting to cross a railroad trestle which spans the rocky bed of Bloody Run, a little bed north of Avondale, she was run down by an express train, the engineer of which was endeavoring to make up for lost time by running at full speed. To prevent being hurled from the trestle she was compelled to let herself down on the outside of the track and hang on until she was rescued.

With Mr. Richard Hall, of Walnut Hills, and Miss Nannie Fisher, of Avondale, she started out for a walk. They went along the Cincinnati and Lebanon and Northern Narrow Gauge railroad toward Lebanon, and as they reached the trestle Mr. Hall and Miss Fisher held back, fearing to meet a train. Miss Onken, though knowing it to be near train time, thought to cross the trestle before the train could come.

She was about half way over when the Montgomery accommodation, due in Cinicnnati at 2:35, whistled. She looked up and was horrified to see the train driving toward her with great speed. It was train No. 12, of which Ed. F. Doherty is conductor and Lee Barnard trainman, and it was traveling between thirty-five and forty miles an hour. When Miss Onken saw the train coming toward her she displayed a wonderful presence of mind by throwing herself over the side of the trestle and there clinging to the timber.

The engineer, George Collins, seeing the gentleman and lady at the other end of the trestle, reversed the engine and stopped as soon as possible; but it was not until he had passed Miss Onken some distance. Running back on the trestle Doherty and Barnard each took one of Miss Onken's hands pulled her up on the track. Her face was black and blue, and she was more dead than alive. She was exhausted and could have held on but a very short time longer.

Without help just at that time she would have fallen into the creek twenty feet or more below her.

After resting a few moments she was able to resume her walk, none the worse for her harrowing experience. The spot where the scene occurred is noted for accidents. On the 4th of July last an old colored woman was thrown from the trestle and dreadfully injured, breaking two of her limbs and fracturing her skull. A few weeks ago there was a collision at this point, and one of the battered engines is still half burried in the mud there.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

A Glorious River.

The St. Lawrence is a phenomenon among rivers. No other river is fed by such gigantic lakes. No other river is so independent of the elements. It despises alike rain, snow and sunshine.

Ice and wind may be said to be the only things that affect its mighty flow. Something almost as phenomenal as the St. Lawrence itself is the fact that there is so little generally known about it. It might be safely affirmed that not one per cent of the American public are aware of the fact that among all the great rivers of the world, the St. Lawrence is the only absolutely floodless one. Such, however is the case. The St. Lawrance despises rain and sunshine. Its greatest variation caused by drought or rain hardly ever exceeds a foot or fourteen inches. The cause of this almost everlasting sameness of volume is easily understood. The St. Lawrence is fed by the mightiest bodies of fresh water on earth. Immense as is the volume of water it pours into the ocean, any one who has traversed all the immense lakes that feed it, and for the surplus waters of which it is the only channel to the sea, wonders that it is not even more gigantic than it is. Not one drop of the waters of the five great lakes finds its way to the ocean save through this gigantic, extraordinary and wondrously beautiful river. No wonder, then, that it should despise the rain and defy the sunshine.—T. O. Russel in Nature's Realm.

Alaska's Bears.

To the bear hunters the wilds of Alaska offer a paradise that can be found in no other country on the globe, as is attested by yearly shipments of hides. The most chosen are those of the black bear, which roam the woods by hundreds, and prime skins bring from $25 up to as high as $100 each in the market. During the excursion season tourists from all parts of the globe make a thriving trade for Alaska merchants in the bear-skin line. There are five distinct species of the bear in Alaska, the black, brown or cinnamon and a cross, which inhabit all portions of Southern Alaska and upper portion of the Yukon County. Further north, in the St. Elias Alps, is the home of a grizzly which in size, ferocity and color much resembles the grizzlies of the Sierra Nevadas, and still further north, along the lower reaches of the Yukon and the ice fields of the Arctic Ocean, is the white polar bear.

As brave and skillful in hunting bear as the Alaskan Indian is, he seldom hunts the St. Elias grizzly, both because there is little profit in the hides and the great size and ferocity of the beasts make hunting them a hazardous undertaking. Their mode of killing them is by shooting into them from a heavily charged smooth-bore musket a heavy slug of lead, copper or iron, then awaiting their charge, which never fails to follow the shot, with a long, heavy and strongly made spear, resting the butt of the weapon on the ground and planting one foot firmly against it. The point of the spear rests at an angle to pierce the bear in the breast, and the bear's own weight, when it strikes the spear in its mad charge, is calculated to drive the weapon through him or pierce him deep enough to cause death. As will be readily seen, if at this critical moment the hunter's courage should fail him, or by a miscalculation the spear failed to impale the charging beast, the hunter would be knocked senseless and immediately torn into shreds. This mode of bear hunting may have its advantages, but only the Alaskan Indian has the courage to try the experiment.—Juneau Letter to the Denver News.

Why Are the Two Buttons?

There are many details in our scheme of attire, the reason whereof is not generally known, says Clothier and Furnisher. In many instances they have filled some essential place in the construction of the prototype of the existing garment and are a survival or some bygone regime. There is one phase of the modern apparel that not one man in a thousand knows the meaning of, and yet custom has made it an unquestioned feature of every modern masculine skirt coat. Why are the two buttons placed at the waist line at the back of the garment? For effect? Not so originally. These two buttons were, at their inception, not primarily for decoration, but for service. It was during the period when the big square-art-embroidered and gorgeously-lined coats were worn, two centuries ago, that the gallants of the time were wont to go forth on dress parade, ready to resent any deviation from the rigid formalities of the court etiquette with a recourse to the sword. In order that the sidearm might be readily reached, the skirts of the coat were turned back in a revere-shaped manner and buttoned or looped upon the buttons at the back, at the same time exploiting a segment of the rich inside of the garment in an unintentionally effective way.

The Case Was Different.

A young woman who had sole charge of a year-old baby had a good deal of trouble with it in the sitting-room of the Erie depot the other afternoon. The little one howled and kicked in several languages, and finally became so much of a nuisance that three or four of the nearest sitters got up and moved away. As they did so an officious woman came forward and asked:

"Are you its mother?"

"No'm; I'm the nurse."

"Well, I'm the mother of five children, and I never had one act as this one does."

"No'm I presume not: but the case was different."

"How so?"

"Why, you were alive and could see to your babies, while the father of this one was killed on the railroad two months ago, and the body of its dead mother is around on the platform in a casket. It's going to Troy for burial, and the little one is going to its grandma's. Sorry, ma'am, but it will cry in spite of all I can do."—New York Sun.

Poor Mrs, Vanderbilt.

New Yorkers are getting to be the most inveterate and cold blooded starers. I once saw Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, a sweet faced and rather pretty woman, come into Stearn's to do some shopping. The women about heard who she was and they stood around her in a circle and simply feasted their eyes upon every detail of her dress and appearance. They loudly called each other's attention to her earrings—solitaire pearls—to the fit of her dress and the way it hung in the back. They came closer and felt it. They studied the way she had her hair done up and suggested that it was worth trying when they got home. They stood shoulder to shoulder with her and learned her hat by heart. She was admirable through it all, pretended she did not see or hear or feel, finally turned around to go, with a blankly absent expression, the cortege thronging around her and escorting her, still loudly commenting, to her carriage.—Cor. San Francisco Argonaut.

Suspended by a Finger.

One of the most singular accidents on record befell Mrs. S. Hardy, of Madison, one day recently. She went into the stable to see about her hens, and stepping upon the feed trough in one of the stalls, reached up with her right hand and drew herself up. An iron garden rake hung there, and she placed her hand on that. In doing so her foot slipped from under her and she fell, catching one of the teeth of the rake into the flesh of the second finger, above the joint, and there she hung, just high enough for her feet to rest on the floor. In this trying position she concluded she might die before any one could come to her assistance, but with a rare presence of mind she caught the handle of a hoe which hung beside the rake with her left hand, drew herself up so as to unhook her finger and fell unconscious to the floor. After a time she recovered and went into the house.—Bangor News.

"A month ago I was happy!" is the declaration of Bryan W. Proctor the poet. So were lots of other folks, who are now telling people in desided nasal tones: "Got a toad in my head." But there is still happiness to be secured; a bottle of Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup will cure any cough or cold.

Reputations Made in a Day

Are precious scarce. Time tries the worth of a man or a medicine. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is a thirty years' growth, and like those hardy lichens that garnish the crevices of Alaska's rocks, it flourishes perennially. And its reputation has as firm a base as the rocks themselves. No medicine is more highly regarded as a remedy for fever and ague, billious remittent, constipation, liver and kidney disorders, nervousness and rheumatism.

An Illustration.

Of the value of extensive and judicious advertising of any article of undoubted merit is found in the remarkable success of the CALIFORNIA FIG SYRUP Co., which has simply been phenomenal, even in this age of great enterprises.

Organized a few years ago to manufacture a new and more perfect remedy than had ever been produced, a laxative with original and attractive features, prepared from delicious fruits and health-giving plants, one which would be pleasant and refreshing to the taste, as well as really beneficial to the system, the management very wisely concluded to select the leading newspapers throughout the United States to make known to the public the merits of the new remedy, Syrup of Figs.

As happens with every valuable remedy, cheap substitutes are being offered to the public, but with the general diffusion of knowledge it is becoming more difficult each day to impose on the public. Health is too important to be trifled with, and reputable druggists will not attempt to deceive the public, as they all know that Syrup of Figs, is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. of San Francisco, Cal., Louisville, Ky., New York, N. Y. Do not accept any cheap non-advertised imitations if offered.

THE PAST LOVE.

I hate the bronze leaves and the red,
And the pale flowers with fluttering stalk
That lined the shadowy poplar walk
Where our first words of love were said.

We loved; the corn was in the ear;
Gay hunters made the hillsides ring;
And, oh, love seemed a beauteous thing,
And all we sighed for close and near!

I hate the woodland's spicy smell,
Through whose wild sweets at dusk we strayed,
Arm linked in arm, by rock and glade,
While the heart whispered, "All is well!"

Was mine the fault that love was brief—
The wonder of a matchless day
Whose glory dimmed and died away
Like the red color on a leaf?

Was mine the fault that all that flame
Passed as a breath and ceased to be?
Heirs of a fruitless hope were we;
Worthy of pity more than blame.

We parted: and the icy gust
Snipped the dull forest's withered plume,
And cast it through the echoing gloom
In purple fringes mixed with dust:

Let winter sweep the desolate aisles,
And make their stones his winnowing floor.
Nay, let the green spring come once more
And light it with immortal smiles!
—Dora Read Goodale in Harper's Weekly.

THE HAND OF FATE.

On a cold blustering night in March a young girl, apparently not more than sixteen years of age slowly wended her way along the country road, situated about five miles from the little village of Oakdale. Her appearance betokened extreme poverty. She was dressed in an ill-fitting suit of rusty black, and her shabby black bonnet was drawn tightly over a thin, pallid face, which was lighted up by a pair of piercing black eyes that seemed to penetrate brillancy. Her long black hair became unfastened by the fierceness of the storm and hung in frozen strands almost to her waist. Everything around her seemed to be touched with the winter's frost, and snow lay piled in huge masses as far as the eye could reach. As she pursued her journey her heart sank within her, her head reeled as if in a drunken stupor, her weary limbs began to fail, and at last nature refused to do its work, and she succumbed to the pitiless cold and sank in an exhausted and unconscious condition to the ground.

Down the road with rapid strides came Farmer Hawkins and his dog Nero, and as he hurried along he stumbled over the prostrate form. In an instant he was on his feet trying to arouse the motionless object before him, while the dog barked vociferously as if imploring aid. In the distance, and a rough voice called out. "Who's there?" "Tis I, your master," responded the farmer as he recognized the voice of his hired man, "and for God's sake make haste or it will be too late." Fritz approached, together they lifted the inanimate form and in a few minutes arrived at the old farm house. It was not long past the usual hour for supper, and Ruth Hawkins, being alarmed at her husbands protracted absence, was seated in her old-fashioned rocker by the side of the open fireplace in the comfortable kitchen of the old homestead knitting, while every now and then she would cast furtive glances toward the window, and strain her ears to listen if she could catch the welcome sound of her husband's footsteps.

The logs burned merrily and cracked and spluttered on the irons, and threw a cheery reflection in all directions about the room. The table was still set, and with a bountiful supply of food. The delicious home-made bread, the print of golden butter, the ruby quinces and quivering custards and the pretty blue and white china offered an inviting prospect to the two men as they passed the window on their way to the sitting room door.

"Mercy's sake, father, what have you there?" exclamed Ruth, as she sprang from her seat, and, opening the door, saw the men with their unconscious burden. "Do not waste any time in asking questions, wife, but bring some brandy as soon as possible," he replied. With careful hands they deposited their unbidden guest upon the settee and drew it in front of the fire. Hastily divesting herself of his outer garments, the farmer endeavored to resuscitate the young girl. Meanwhile Ruth had returned to the room with the brandy, and with kindly hands moistened the lips of the young girl, and succeeded in forcing a few drops down her throat, while the farmer was busily engaged in rubbing and slapping her hands. At first all their attempts to bring the girl back to consciousness seemed fruitless, but at last a faint flush overspread her features, she opened her eyes, and in pitiful tones begged that she might remain during the night. The farmer had scarcely noticed the girl, but he now looked anxiously at her. "We shall keep her shan't we father?" asked Mrs. Hawkins. "Of course; did you ever know me to turn anyone from my door? Saint or sinner, rich or poor, they are welcome to stay; but how goes the supper, wife? I am as hungry as a wolf." "All ready, father," was the reply, and as she spoke she placed the steaming coffee urn upon the table. "What shall I call you?" asked Mrs. Hawkins as she placed a saucer of custard upon a chair by the side of the settee. "Call me Lena," repeated the girl, as she tried to partake of the food that was offered to her.

The hospitable couple watched the stranger curiously, trying to solve the mystery that hung around her. Those white hands had never scrubbed or scoured, and there was a certain grace about every movement which impressed on the idea that she was of gentle birth, a girl whom no ordinary sorrow had made a homeless wanderer. The clock struck 8 and then 9 and still they sat gazing at the girl as she lay quietly. When the clock struck 10 and the last chimes had died away, the girl timidly inquired if she was keeping them from their rest. "Do not mind me," she said, "I can sleep here very comfortably."

It had been a query with Mrs. Hawkins where to put the newcomer ever since she had asked her to stay. The garret was first thought of, then the west room, but now, lighting a fresh candle, Mrs. Hawkins led her guest into the parlor and through it into the best spare room, and turning down the lavender-scented sheets and shaking the downy pillows of the tented bed-stead, she said in motherly tones: "Sleep here," and going back to the kitchen murmured dreamily: "For in so doing you may entertain angels unawares."

About midnight the sorm, which had been gathering all its forces during the evening, burst violently forth. The old farm house fairly rocked with wild gusts of wind, while the snow fell fast and furious. It is no wonder that the poor girl hid her head beneath the blankets and thanked God for the shelter she had found, and when, after hours had passed, the storm gradually abated, she fell into a refreshing slumber. The next morning she was awakened by a tapping at the door, and the voice of Mrs. Hawkins inquiring if she might come in.

Entering the room and approaching the bed, Mrs. Hawkins found her guest much better, but still suffering from the effects of the physical strain to which she had been subjected during the previous night.

"Lie still my dear," said the kind hearted woman, as the girl attempted to raise herself on her elbow. I will bring you something to eat, and perhaps, by noon you may be able to get up."

In a few moments Mrs. Hawkins returned bearing in her hands a tray covered with a snowy cloth, on which were temptingly arranged some nicely buttered toast, a poached egg and a delicious cup of coffee.

"Now, dear, eat a good breakfast, and we will soon have the roses back in your ckeeks."

Placing the tray on the side of the bed Mrs. Hawkins left the room, and after she had cleared away her breakfast dishes and finished her usual work, she again returned to the chamber and found that Lena had eaten heartily of the food placed before her and was sleeping soundly.

"Poor child, I will let her sleep," said Mrs. Hawkins to herself; "she is in need of it," and lifting the tray she she stepped softly out of the room.

In the afternoon Lena awoke, and on hearing the clock in the parlor strike three she was astonished to find that she had slept so long. Hurriedly dressing herself she soon made her appearance in the kitchen, where she found Mrs. Hawkins darning her husband's socks, and the farmer taking his accustomed afternoon nap in the rocking chair by the fire. At the sound of footsteps the farmer awoke with a start, and straightening himself up, inquired of the girl if she was better. "Much better, I thank you, sir, and I will not intrude upon your hospitality any longer," replied the girl holding her bonnet in her hands. "I am afraid you will have to content yourself here another night," said the farmer, "for the roads are impassiable. The snow has drifted so high in some places that it would cover a little body like you; but won't your friends be alarmed by your absence?"

"My friends," replied the girl, sadly. "I am trying to find them, and if you will allow me to tell you my story, perhaps you can assist me as they live somewhere in this region." Placing a chair near her own. Mrs. Hawkins requested the girl to be seated, while they listened to her story.

'My mother," said she," was the only daughter of a wealthy farmer, who was left a widow at her birth, leaving him with two children—my mother and a son ten years of age. When she was sixteen years old my father secretly wedded her against my grandfather's wishes, and although she wrote to that relative repeatedly begging for forgiveness, her letters were returned unopened. After two years of unalloyed happiness I was born, and for ten years my parents' union was a happy one until the fatal day came which deprived my mother of one of the most indulgent of fathers. One day a large sum of money was found missing from the safe in the office in which my father was employed as bookkeeper, and he being the one who had access to the safe and some of the stolen money being found in his desk, he was arrested, tried and convicted and sentenced to ten years imprisonment. My mother, firmly believing him innocent, converted everything of any value into money to obtain lawyers hoping to save him. She appealed to her father, but he would not listen to her, and her letters again were returned unopened. She wrote to her brother, but with the same result, and she was finally obliged to see my father sent to prison, strongly protesting his innocence to the last. For four years my mother managed to eke out a scanty subsistence with her needle, with what little assistance I could give her, but at last care and sorrow did their work; and she was finally forced to give up in despair, and eventually became a victim to quick consumption. For nine long weeks she was confined to her bed, gradually wasting away. A little while before her death she called me to her bedside, and, placing a letter in my hands, exacted a promise from me that immediately after her death I would sell what little furniture we had, go to my grandfather and deliver the proceeds into his hands. As the tears streamed down my cheeks she took my hands in hers, and, with a heavenly smile on her countenance bade me good-bye and asked me to meet her in heaven. Her last moments were spent in breathing words of affection for the husband she had still loved so dearly.

"With the assistance of some kind neighbors and the sale of what little furniture we had I procured enough money to pay for a decent burial, and three days after her funeral I started on my journey to find my grandfather. I had only sufficient money to buy my railroad ticket and a little more, but the landlady with whom we lived and to whom I had sold the furniture prepared a little lunch for me and saw me safely on the cars. After a journey of six hours I reached my destination. As soon as I alighted I inquired of the man at the station the way to the Brinwood farm.

"'You will have to take the stage, miss,' replied the man. 'I don't see any of their folks down to-day and here it comes now.' Assisting me to get in, he bade me good night, leaving me to wonder what sort of people I should meet and how they wonld treat me.

"A half hour's ride brought me to a large, old-fashioned house, standing in the center of a lonely lawn, with an abundance of trees and a carriage drive on both sides of the house. Handing my fare to the driver, he helped me to dismount, and a few moments brought me to the house. In answer to my ring at the bell the door opened, and a good-natured colored girl inquired who I wanted.

"'Your master,' I replied. 'Will you walk in and be seated and I will call him,' said she, ushering me into a large comfortably furnished room on one side of the spacious hall. In a few moments an elderly gentleman appeared and asked me my business with him. I drew the letter from my pocket, and handed it to him, told him that was for my grandfather. Adjusting his spectacles, he read the envelope carefully, and in a tone of surprise exclaimed: "My dear miss, the gentleman to whom this letter is addressed has been dead for thirteen years. They say he died of a broken heart, caused by the disappearance of his only daughter, who ran away and got married. At all events he never forgave her, and forbade her name to be mentioned, and finally died, leaving everything to his only son, with the provision that if he should seek out his sister the property should go to an institution. The son never caring to live in the old house sold it to me, and moved away three or four miles from the village of Oakdale, a distance of twenty miles, but it will be impossible for you to get there to-night, as there are no more trains, but I will call my daughter and she will find you a bed for the night.'

"A few minutes later he returned with a very prepossessing young lady, who he introduced as his daughter. After I had joined them at supper she desired me to follow her into the hall up stairs into the prettiest room I had ever seen. The pale yellow carpet, with its bunches of roses; the carved cherry bedstead, with its dainty hangings; the dressing bureau, with its pretty cover of satin and lace; the pretty little willow rocking chair—everything gave evidence of refinement and luxury.

The next morning after partaking of of a hearty breakfast, I thanked them for their kindness and started on my journey to find my uncle. For nearly two days I journeyed along sometimes getting a lift from one of the farm wagons, and accasionally a meal from some of the kind hearted people I would ask to direct me. I became so weak from want of food that I conld go no further,—and—you know the rest.

As the farmer listened attentively to her sad story his face grew pale and, striving to conceal the agitation which convulsed his entire frame, he demandin husky tones the name of the uncle she was trying to seek.

As soon as he could sufficiently control his emotions to speak, he stretched out his arms and clasped her to his breast, and in broken accents exclaimed: "Truly the hand of Providence has directed you higher, for 'tis I, your uncle, who has brought you to this house, and our home shall be yours and you shall be one of us." Embracing first one and then the other she drew the secret letter from her pocket and handed it to her uncle.

As he took it from her hand he pressed it to his lips and said: "My poor child, as soon as your grandfather died I made every effort to find my sister and I traced her as far as London, where I learned the story of your father's misfortune. There all traces of her were lost, and I concluded she had changed her name and gone to America. At all events, I had given her up for dead, and now, after eighteen years she has returned to me in the form of her daughter."—New York Mail.

The Sheriff's Nervy Wife.

W. D. Blanton, of Stephenville, Tex., convicted of horse theft and granted a new trial, was remanded to jail. One day while Perkins, acting jailer in the absence of Sheriff Shands, was feeding the prisoners, Blanton, who had concealed himself in the run around, and provided himself with a loose stove leg, made a break for liberty, running Perkins down stairs. Perkins fell as he ran, and yelled out, "Look out! Blanton is coming!"

Mrs. Shands, wife of the sheriff, who resides below, called to her daughters to run and lock the doors, while she gathered the Winchester, threw a cartridge in it and drew it upon the prisoner, who cried out, "Mr. Shands, don't be excited." She replied, "You are the only one excited. Hold up!" and he held up and was marched back. —Cor. Fort Worth Gazette.

Heroic Treatment of a Cold.

"You have taken a severe cold," said the old family doctor, "and it seems to have settled in your throat."

"Yes, doctor, you see I can hardly speak," said the patient, a vivacious, bright-eyed young woman.

"Can you stand heroic treatment, do you think?" asked the doctor.

"Try me!"

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, anything you like; medicine, mustard plasters, electricity anything!" said she in a breath.

"And you want to get back your voice?"

"Yes!"

"It's heroic treatment, mind you."

"All right—what is it?"

"You mustn't talk at all for two days."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Prevention

Is better than cure and people who are subject to rheumatism, can prevent attacks by keeping the blood pure and free from the acid which causes the disease. This suggests the use of Hood's Sarsaparilla, unquestionably the best blood purifier, and which has been used with great success for this very purpose by many people.

Hood's Sarsaparilla has also cured innumerable cases of rheumatism of the severest sort, by its powerful effect in neutralizing acidity of the blood, and in enabling the kidneys and liver to properly remove the waste of the system. Try it.

One Wife's Thanksgiving.

"I have lost $80,000 in the recent slump in stocks," said a New Yorker whose home life has been unexceptionable as his modest public career has been above reproach, "and I am practically left without capital. I will have to begin the world again at 45 no better off than when I started at 20. For a long time I hesitated about breaking the news of my financial ruin to my wife. This is the plan I hit on: I took her to dinner at Delmonico's the night before Thanksgiving. Then I took her to the theater. Our Thanksgiving dinner was a dainty one, and when it was over I looked around at the dining room I am unable longer to use, and at the dear home I shall have to move out of, it cost me a struggle; but I told her all. If I had any doubts as to how she would receive the news they were at once dissipated. Some wives are worth many fortunes."—New York World.

A Fact.

From an interview, N. Y. World.

In an interview with a leading drug-house the N. Y. World, Nov. 9, 1890, gives the following comment on the proprietors of reliable patent medicines:

"He is a specialist, and should know more of the disease he actually treats than the ordinary physician; for while the latter may come across say fifty cases in a year of the particular disease which his medicine combats, its manufacturer investigates thousands. Don't you suppose his prescription, which you buy ready made up for 50 cents, is likely to do more good than that of the ordinary physician, who charges you anywhere from $2 to $10 for giving it, and leaves you to pay the cost of having it prepared?

"The patent medicine man, too, usually has the good sense to confine himself to ordinary, every-day diseases. He leaves to the physician cases in which there is immediate danger to life, such as violent fevers. He does this because, in the treatment of such cases, there are other elements of importance besides medicine, such as proper diet, good nursing, a knowledge of the patient's strength and so on. Where there is no absolute danger to life, where the disease is one which some physician has already determined, the patent medicine maker says fearlessly: I have a preparation which is better than any other known and which will cure you.' In nine cases out of ten his statement is true."

This is absolutely true as regards the great remedy for pain, St. Jacobs Oil. It can assert without fear of contradition, that it is a prompt and permanent cure of pain. It can show proofs of cures of chronic cases of 20, 30 and 40 years' standing. In truth it rarely ever fails if used according to directions, and a large proportion of cures is made by half the contents of a single bottle. It is therefore the best.

The man who can't sing and has a baby is usually made to sing.

"German Syrup"

A Cough and Croup Medicine.

For children a medicine should be absolutely reliable. A mother must be able to pin her faith to it as to her Bible. It must contain nothing violent, uncertain, or dangerous. It must be standard in material and manufacture. It must be plain and simple to administer; easy and pleasant to take. The child must like it. It must be prompt in action, giving immediate relief, as childrens' troubles come quick, grow fast, and end fatally or otherwise in a very short time. It must not only relieve quick but bring them around quick, as children chafe and fret and spoil their constitutions under long confinement. It must do its work in moderate doses. A large quantity of medicine in a child is not desirable. It must not interfere with the child's spirits, appetite or general health. These things suit old as well as young folks, and make Boschee's German Syrup the favorite family medicine. ①

Official Paper of the City.

JAS. MEEHAN, JR. Editor and Prop.

The same amount of county printing this year will cost one-third more than last year. This is retrenchment with a vengeance.

Judging from appearances there is a good sprinkling of hayseed in both branches of the legislature. The grangers, however, are a respectable looking lot of men.

Senator Lommen has introduced a bill designating the kind of coal railroads shall use in cities of 20,000 inhabitants. There are so many cities of this size in his district that it is very important what kind of coal the companies use.

Certain papers throughout the county have been talking about the territory in the proposed division containing only a few townships. This is going into the field of falsehood for an argument. The proposed new counties each contain from eighteen to twenty townships. These are more than one and one-half times as large as many of the counties in the states.

There is no end to the amount of railroad legislation already introduced in the legislature. The farmers want better freight rates, an open market for wheat and still they are manufacturing the rope with which to hang themselves. Anything that tends to stop railroad construction certainly prevents competition and monopoly is allowed to take its course.

The natural order of things are changed at the state capitol. They have placed storm doors on the inside of the building. This was no doubt suggested by Donnelly to keep in the secrets of executive sessions that he might be allowed to play the judas act with the alliance when confirming Merriam's appointees, and the outside world would be none the wiser.

Last week we had the extreme pleasure of gazing down upon that august body, the legislature of Minnesota, from the pent-up gallery of the state house. The average Minnesotian is filled with a feeling of disgust when he enters the capitol for the first time and he commences to wonder how so great a state as this allows itself to be disgraced—its pride humbled—its fair name blotted—by the old barracks yclept capitol.

Anent the county division Crookston is building railroads to all parts of the county. They are also reducing the county officers' salaries through alliance resolutions and prepared legislation. What a boomerang to hurl at an over-taxed people. There is deception in the above reductions of saleries and in the railroad from Crookston to Red Lake Falls. We trust the farmers will not be hoodwinked into listening any to such silent arguments which are only intended to influence our legislators.

Cancer and Smoking.

Since the death of President Grant, a constant smoker, cancer of the tongue and cigar smoking have been closely associated in the public mind. Surgeons of experience find that the disease is far more frequent in persons who have been in the habit of smoking. The disease appears to be about six times more common in males than in females.

The affection known as "smoker's patch" is common. It is a slightly raised oval area on the fore part of the tongue, a little to one side of the middle line, just where the end of the pipe rests or where the stream of smoke from the pipe or cigar impinges on the surface of the tongue. The patch is usually red, but it may be bluish or pearly white. It lasts for years, but tends to spread over the surface of the tongue if the irritation be continued. When diffused in this fashion it constitutes leucoma of the tongue.

Leucoma is certainly a predisposing cause of cancer. The smoker should never leave a "patch" untreated, and should avoid rough mouthpieces and brands of tobacco which cause irritation of the tongue.—Hall's Journal.

Electrical Furnaces.

It seems not unlikely that electricity will be applied to smelting furnaces in the near future. An electrical furnace has been patented in England which is said to have given excellent results in the series of tests to which it has been subjected. The electrodes are blocks of a carbon secured in metal cases, and placed opposite to each other in the walls of the furnace. The metal cases containing the carbons are kept cool by circulating water around them, and the carbons themselves are capable of automatic adjustment to compensate for wear. Provision is made in the furnace for the escape of gas and for the introduction of the charge, and the electromotive force of the current can be varied according to the varying resistance of the charge.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Not a Bump of Parental Affection.

"The development at the back of the head, my friends, indicates parental affection," explained the phrenologist. "Now, you will observe," he went on, feeling the head of the boy on the platform, "that this bump is abnormal in size, thus indicating that this lad loves and reveres his parents to an unusual degree. Is not that so, my lad?"

"No."

"What? You do not love your parents?"

"I think well enough of mother," replied the boy, "but I ain't very fond of father. That bump you're a-feelin' of he gave me last night with a stick."—London Tit-Bits.

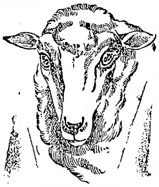
THE RAISING OF SHEEP.

BY THOROUGH VIGILANCE, INTELLIGENCE AND NECESSARY KINDNESS,

Together With the Favorable Climate, Feeding Grounds and Means of Shelter Found in Minnesota and the Dakotas, It Can Be Made a Profitable and Pleasant Occupation.

Sheep husbandry was one of the first and favored occupations of civilized man. Shepherds still tend their flocks on the hills of Bible lands as did the patriarchs of forty centuries ago. There has been little change or improvement, however, in the appearance, wool or meat of these old time flocks, and for that matter the shepherds have changed but little themselves. No animal perhaps is so universally distributed over the world, furnishing food and clothing for mankind, as the sheep. The rearing of sheep therefore is no new business. For novices to engage in it for temporary speculation, however, it is a matter of risk.

It is the prediction of The Western Rural that sheep will always be largely bred in this country, whether we have high tariff or low tariff, or no tariff at all. The excellence of sheep as farm stock shows itself too conspicuously, in several ways, for the business ever to be abandoned.

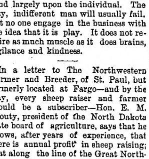


CHOICE SPRING LAMB.

The farmers of the Northwest are taking much interest in the industry, but many of them lack the necessary knowledge and experience. The profit in sheep husbandry depends upon the proper selection of the stock and the attention given the flocks. These requirements met, combined with its favorable climate and grasses, will make the Dakotas and Minnesota as noted for wool and mutton as they are for wheat.

The flesh and wool of the sheep are the products of the soil: the best grass for them is the low growing and clinging varieties common in the west, which, combined with wild plants, make excellent pasturage. Success in the sheep business in the Northwest has passed beyond the experimental stage—with the right kind of men. Profits depend largely upon the individual. The lazy, indifferent man will usually fail. Let no one engage in the business with the idea that it is play. It does not require as much muscle as it does brains, vigilance and kindness.

In a letter to The Northwestern Farmer and Breeder, of St. Paul, but formerly located at Fargo—and by the way, every sheep raiser and farmer should be a subscriber—Hon. E. M. Prouty, president of the North Dakota state board of agriculture, says that he knows, after years of experience, that there is annual profit in sheep raising; that along the line of the Great Northern, west of the Red River valley, there are still innumerable places adapted to the business.



HERO PRINCE.

This illustration is that of a Merino ram that sold for $3,500.

Superintendent O. C. Gregg, of the Minnesota Farmers' Institute, says that "Nature's antelope country, which is the prairie region of Western Minnesota and the Dakotas, is the sheep country of civilization."

Thousands of sheep for breeding purposes have been already imported from Montana. No doubt some ewes are too old for this use. On this account some disappointment will result. A prominent stock raiser of the Mouse River country states that a band of 1,000 ewes was brought into western North Dakota by an inexperienced man, who discovered when it was too late that they had no teeth wherewith to gather their food. An experienced flock master would have discovered this before purchasing.

Montana sheep may be hustlers, but they do better under shelter during stormy or cold weather than in the snow and rain, and water is better for them than snow to quench their thirst, and hay is superior to husks and brush to make flesh and wool. No doubt a good many of these new comers to the Dakotas are old ewes and weaklings culled from large flocks, and had they not been sold a fair share would probably have died this winter, and they may anyhow, unless extraordinary care is taken of them. This warning is given and the utmost caution is urged upon every new man who has embarked in a business he knows but little about. Unless you give extreme care to your flock this winter, next spring you may not have a very high opinion of the sheep business.

Every farmer should keep a few sheep, if only for domestic use. Mutton is a most desirable meat, as it is good in any form—roasted, baked, boiled, fried, stewed or hashed. It has a woolly taste only when the sheep is run down in flesh through starvation.

If you are not familiar with the business of handling sheep, go slow. Because a small flock is profitable do not imagine that large ones are. More dangers menace large flocks than the small ones near the house.

The observance of some general rules or system is necessary to the best success in establishing a profitable band of sheep.

Only ewes of one and two years should be bought.

The buyer should be satisfied that they are free from scab or foot rot.

For Minnesota and the Dakotas a Merino-Cotswold or Shropshire cross, an animal of fair excellence both for wool and mutton, seems to be the present favorite.

They should have roomy, well ventilated sheds for shelter from storms. The shelter may be left open on the south side. Observe cleanliness under foot.

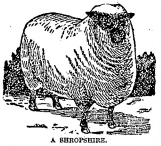
Never let them be exposed to storms, or, if possible, become chilled by cold rains. Nature has provided sheep protection against ordinary cold.

It takes some time for wet wool to dry, and in the meantime the sheep suffers, if they do not take cold. They can stand a good deal of water, but it should be inside and not outside. A soaking rain washes the dirt down to the skin and gives the wool a dingy appearance.

In fine weather at all seasons they should be kept during the day on the range. This is as necessary for healthful exercise as the purpose of securing food. Plenty of air is one of the essentials to the health of sheep.

Ranges infested with burrs and devil's needles should be avoided. The former spoil the wool; the latter have been known to kill sheep.

In lambing time the herder or owner should remain with the band day and night. "Eternal vigilance" is the price of lambs, as well as of the full grown sheep.



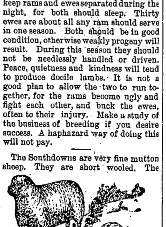
A SHROPSHIRE.

An enthusiast (and we will not say it was J. Bookwalter), in speaking of the Shropshire, said: "It is a farmer's sheep, a rent paying sheep, a tenant's sheep. It is a money making, wool producing, mutton carrying sheep. It's a bank, a save-all, a frugal living and quick fattening, hardy sheep."

Buy only the best pure blooded rams to improve your flock.

The ewes should be served by the rams during December so that lambs will come about June. This is a most important matter and personal attention should be given to it by the flock master in not allowing excess and exhaustion by the rams. Overwork means barren ewes and loss of lambs. See that the duty is performed during the day, and keep rams and ewes separated during the night, for both should sleep. Thirty ewes are about all any ram should serve in one season. Both should be in good condition, otherwise weakly progeny will result. During this season they should not be needlessly handled or driven. Peace, quietness and kindness will tend to produce docile lambs. It is not a good plan to allow the two to run together, for the rams become ugly and fight each other, and buck the ewes, often to their injury. Make a study of the business of breeding if you desire success. A haphazard way of doing this will not pay.

The Southdowns are very fine mutton sheep. They are short wooled. The ewes are prolific. In England, where sheep raising is a science, beautifully marblized mutton is produced.



AMERICAN SOUTHDOWNS.

Marketable wool should be free from burrs, chaff, and tags or skirt locks. Wool is sold at the market price of actual fibre. Dirt in no form pays in wool.

For winter fodder oat straw is estimated at 75 per cent. and wheat straw at 70 per cent. of average meadow hay. Straw is less constipating than hay. Flax straw mixed with hay makes a good feed but alone is apt to act as a physic. In feeding, a good ration is what the animal will eat up clean.

The ewes should be "tagged," that is, the wool under the tail and around the udder should be cut off to allow the lambs freedom in sucking and to prevent the accumulation of filth.

Avoid too much green food, and except with old wethers or ewes being fattened for market, concentrated food should not be given.

Give them a change of feed, if possible, every week, by varying from hay to corn fodder, then millet and straw, etc., as you can. This will keep their bowels regular and make good flesh and wool.

Another report was current the first of the week that the Chippewas were actually on the war path and driving settlers near the reservation from their homes. J. C. Huler, of Red Wing, has but little praise for the citizens of that berg: Says they seem to be all asleep. Even poor old Crookston, in comparison, is preferable—and Red Lake Falls! The farmers there are all well to-do, else they could not endure the repeated crop failures, which are the result of chinch bugs, drouth, frost, and above all worn out soil, where, for thirty years or more crops have been draining the vitality of the land. We acknowledge a most intertaning call from Mr. Corbil, the genius of Badgertown. At some future day when we gain his consent) but not a minute before) we will give out readers a glowing account of the inventions which he soon hopes to perfect. Some people say he is at a perpetual motion machine. He says "Men is equal to God in knowledge of good and evil." As there are but good and evil, he concludes that man is equal to God in knowledge of all things, and as knowledge is power men must therefore be equal to God in power. Mr. Corbil is a deep thinking man and may yet surprise the world with the product of his brain.

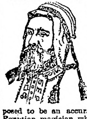
SPOOK PICTURES.

A Large Number Sold to a New York Woman.

SHE BELIEVED THEM GENUINE.

The Astonishing Friendship of a Refined and Educated Woman for Mme. Diss Debar—Men Who Have Been Gulled by Female Swindlers.

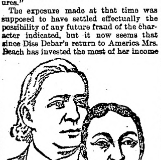
[Copyright by American Press Association.]



MARONA is a name which can be applied to nothing tangible save a picture now in the possession of Mrs. Alfred E. Beach. This picture was "developed" under "spirit influence" by a man named Souter, and is supposed to be an accurate likeness of an Egyptian magician who departed this life an indefinite number of centuries ago, and who has of late condescended to identify himself with things earthly, as the invisible guide, philosopher and friend of the aforesaid Mrs. Beach.

This elderly lady is the wife of the editor of The Scientific American and a well known resident of New York city. She secured unpleasant prominence some days ago by appearing on two successive evenings as a speaker at the meetings held for the purpose of securing funds wherewith to found a home for impoverished mediums. It then came to the knowledge of the public for the first time that this refined and delicately sensitive woman was on friendly terms with the widely advertised Ann O'Delia Salomon, alias Diss Debar, who secured an abundance of notoriety some two years ago because of her remarkable transactions with Luther R. Marsh, who spent large sums in the purchase of what are known as "spook pictures."

The exposure made at that time was supposed to have settled effectually the possibility of any future fraud of the character indicated, but it now seems that since Diss Debar's return to America Mrs. Beach has invested the most of her income in securing daubs similar to those to which Mr. Marsh pinned his faith. The medium through whom these portraits "came" is the person Souter, already mentioned.

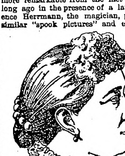


THE BEACH-BEECHER PICTURE.

From time to time he supplied Mrs. Beach with drawings which purported to be the work of Michael Angelo, Titian, Rubens, and so on. These specimens of spirit art bore the signatures of the supposed painters, and it did not seem to detract from their value, in Mrs. Beach's eyes at least, that one of the old masters mentioned above wrote his name "Reubens," or that Cassandra, the prophetess of Homer's song, who assumed responsibility for the picture of Amarona, forwarded messages to which she affixed a misspelled name.

The prominence of this latest worshiper at the shrine of Diss Debar has naturally attracted general attention, both to her and to the people in whose good faith and supernatural powers she places belief. The "Fat Priestess," as Ann O'Delia's enemies irreverently call her, has vigorously resented the published charge that she is "one of a crew of spirit bunco steerers," and has also denied that she ever acted as the medium employed by Mrs. Beach for obtaining her spirit phenomena. She has gone even further, and washed her hands of James Souter and all his works, "spook pictures" included. These latter she declares are mere daubs, and "not the beautiful examples of art which had been seen in the Marsh collection," although she is confident that they are of spirit origin. To supernatural agency she also attributes another picture, highly prized by its owner, which displays the countenance of Mrs. Beach side by side with that of the spiritualized Henry Ward Beecher.

Mme. Diss Debar's "confidence" is the more remarkable from the fact that not long ago in the presence of a large audience Herrmann, the magician, produced similar "spook pictures" and explained the process of their manufacture. The more common method, he said, was to put the portrait on canvas in the ordinary manner employed by painters, and then cover it with a china wash, which presented a white, smooth and blank surface to the eye of the person to be deceived. Delicate manipulation of a wet sponge at the proper time would absorb the covering, and bring out the picture to the mutual satisfaction of both dupe and swindler.

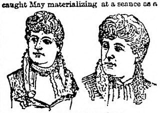


MRS. TOBIAS T. STRYKER.

Considering the frequency of exposure, and the wide publicity given to the doings of so-called traffickers with the spirit world, it is remarkable that knaves still find willing and eager victims always at hand. It is also remarkable that the principals in these affairs have been women, while the people they have gulled have been generally of the opposite sex. It is not so long ago that Mrs. Tobias T. Stryker secured the implicit confidence of a wealthy New York merchant, and carried her preten[illegible] o[illegible]

The [illegible] season [illegible] Stryker that a [illegible] born of the union. [illegible] rival the woman declared that [illegible] christenings in heaven just as on earth, and that the parents had resolved to have their child baptized at Niagara Falls. A carload of people went to the Falls and took part in the ceremony, which was conducted by Mrs. Stryker under trance conditions. The woman for a while had much influence with the merchant, and with a small circle of followers who accorded her ministerial powers and even regarded her as competent to officiate at weddings.

She has now dropped out of sight, as have also Lizzie and May Bangs, who created something of a sensation while residents of Chicago. The specialty of the Bangs sisters was slate writing, and the principal person to come under their influence was a photographer named Jestram. Whenever he desired, and had money to pay the "postage," they called up the spirits of his dead children, and displayed to him letters written by them. The credulity of the man was the more astonishing as one of his offspring had lived but twenty-four hours, and the other but four months. He finally went crazy, and a little after his incarceration in an asylum two policemen caught May materializing at a seance as a Russian princess, and took her and Lizzie to prison. They were held for running a show without a license, and for obtaining money by false pretenses.



LIZZIE AND MAY BANGS.

Mme. Stoddard Gray flourished for awhile in New York city, and brought under her influence a merchant who mourned the loss of a much loved wife. Mme. Gray secured his presence at seances and gave him several interviews with the spirit of his better half. The merchant's friends decided to interfere, and one night accompanied him to the parlors of the medium. When the dead wife came out she was seized by the unbelievers, the light was turned up, the sheet was stripped off, and there appeared to view the stalwart form and whiskered face of Mme. Gray's son. It is hardly necessary to add that the merchant went home cured of his delusion.

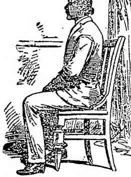
A similar exposure terminated the career of Eliza A. Wells, who flourished for a brief season in New York city. Anna Eva Fay came to grief in Boston, and it is not so very long ago that the noted Fox sisters came forward, and as a matter of duty to the public, and for their own peace of mind, confessed that theirs had been lives of deception and fraud.

But it is hardly probable that confessions or exposures will reduce the ranks of the willingly credulous. Those who prey upon society have a saying more forcible than elegant to the effect that "a sucker is born every minute," and doubtless as long as the world exists people will be swindled and other people thrive upon the profits of rascality. Under these conditions even that large and respectable body of people known as spiritualists can hardly be expected to keep wolves out of the fold.

WILFORD KYRKE.

Peached on His Pals.

W. A. Armorauiha is a Singalese, of Singapore, who succumbed to the Salvation Army songs and cymbals in San Francisco and became a Christian. It seems that he took it seriously, for when they held an experience meeting, and each was telling what an awful sinner he had been, Armorauiha announced that he was an uncommonly big sinner, for he had just assisted in swindling the United States custom house.



ARMORAUIHA TESTIFYING.

It was a plain case, so far, of very "thorough conversion" indeed, but when he went before United States Commissioner Sawyer and made oath to the fact the public became intensely interested, for he implicated his employer, B. A. da Silva, of the great Silva firm of Hong Kong, Australia, etc., as well as Aramale Apoo and another Singalee, who is called Da Silva because a servant of that gentleman. The firm had already attracted much attention by going about San Francisco in their native costume, with their long hair very fancifully done up, and when they were brought before the United States district court there was a crowd in attendance.

It was shown that they had placed in bond, according to law, three cases of valuable jewelry and precious stones, but had in addition kept on and about their persons other jewels of value—certainly $3,000 worth—and the only question was whether these were of their ordinary wear and therefore non-dutiable. On this point the three did some "pretty hard swearing," the servant especially testifying that he owned various bracelets, rings, etc. The merchant also said that it was Armorauiha's duty to make out the list of jewels which should be left in the custom house or entered for duty; that the latter had purposely done wrong and then informed, in order to take a mean revenge for some fancied injury. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, the court let them off with comparatively light penalties; but at last accounts they were still followed by curious crowds whenever they appeared on the street.

Highwaymen made a big haul at Chicago the other evening. They assaulted Dr. H. A. Kelso, of Paxton, Ills., and after beating him into insensibility rifled his person of $5,000 and a lot of jewelry.

R. nonsense but in plain old soldier fashion.

On the continent the thaw is less decided, except in France, where the seaport of Fecamp, on the English channel, was flooded so quickly that the inhabitants barely escaped with their lives. Mails in Germany, Belgium, Holland and France are yet delayed by snow. From Austria still come reports of rigorous weather and cases of freezing to death are reported.

The Railway Age gives a list of the most serious accidents on the railways of the United States and Canada during the year 1890. Only those are given in which a number of lives were lost or in which the number of injured was large. All accidents in which one, and sometimes two trainmen were killed are omitted. The list as published includes sixty-one accidents, in which 266 persons were killed and 539 injured. This gives a total of 795, making an average of thirteen person killed or wounded in each accident. Many of the accidents were without fault of any one connected with the movement of the trains, but in some cases the accidents were inexcusable, resulting from the carelessness or ignorance of employes.

Did Not Trouble Him.

Yankee Blade: When Sam Jones was preaching in a Western town some time ago he was annoyed by a young man who was whispering to his girl. Finally the preacher could stand the interruption no longer, so he looked straight at the young man and said:

"I will pause until the young man in the back of the room gets through talking."

The silence was intense, and every eye was on the young man, who was still whispering to his girl. He had been so busy that he had not caught the preacher's censure. Mr. Jones repeated the remark, and this time the young man heard him. Not an instant did he hesitate, but he immediately tried to square himself. While everyone was watching him he looked squarely at the preacher and said:

"Go right ahead, Mr. Jones, you are not bothering me."

A DOUBLE TRAGEDY.

Christ Abrahamson Murders Miss Annie Ronninger in Pope County, Minn.

Using the Revolver Upon Himself He Follows His Victim Into the Unknown.

GLENWOOD, Minn., Special Telegram, Jan. 27.—Word has reached here from Ben Wade township, this county, of a shocking affair at the residence of Mr. Simonson. It seems that Christ Abrahamson, a youth about eighteen years old, called at the residence and shot Miss Annie Ronninger, a young lady about fifteen years, she dying in a few moments after. He then shot himself through the head, dying almost instantly. The cause of the shooting is the fact that the girl had repulsed the affectionate advances of the murderer, who then, in a fit of anger, did the deed which sent two lives into eternity.

SLOWLY STARVING.

An Illinois Man's Terrible Mode of Ending His Life.

ALTON, Ill., Jan. 27.—In the little town of Newbern, twelve miles from here, George Harris lies on a sick bed, from which he will probably never rise. Last night closed the twenty-ninth day of his fast with the determined man still alive, but he is lingering in a condition of most ghastly weakness, stupor and emaciation.

When death does come it will mark the close of probably the most grim and stubborn march to the grave ever made voluntarily by a man tired of living, and George Harris' fast will break the record as an instance of a deliberate and prearranged suicide by a new and peculiarly appalling route.

Harris has been a hopeless invalid for some time, and on Dec. 28 he announced his determination to starve himself to death and has not tasted a mouthful of food since.

The scene at the house of his sister, Mrs. Dow, with whom Mr. Harris has resided for a number of years, is one that can never be forgotten. Friends of the desperate and obstinate man have been gathered about him all day. He lies in a sort of strange stupor nearly all the time, a condition of trance-weakness, that keeps him oblivious of his surroundings. Occasionally, however, pangs of hunger grow so keen that his sufferings rouse him from his lethargy. Then begins a struggle between his will power and his craving for food, which is the most horrible feature of his effort at self-destruction.

The iron will of the man invariably wins, and his condition is rapidly becoming such that the desire for food will be lost in the fatal lassitude that will precede his last hours. He is sinking rapidly, and it will be impossible for him to linger much longer.

ROBERT HAMILTON ALIVE.

His Alleged Drowning in Snake River Only a Ruse.

LEWISTON, Idaho, Jan. 27.—News has been brought in here by a ranchman named Sanford that Robert Ray Hamilton, who was reported to have drowned in the Snake river while hunting last June, is still alive and enjoying good health.

Sanford says he learned this from men who worked on the Hamilton-Sargent ranch. From their remarks he gleaned that there was a cloud upon Hamilton's life, and he wanted it to appear to the world that he was dead, The corpse of a man who very much resembled Hamilton was secured and placed in the river where it was found, and the information given out that he was dead.

The laborers said several prominent people were in the secret that Hamilton was still living, and that he had gone either to Australia or Alaska under an assumed name.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA.

Spain Accepts the Proposition Made by the United States.

MADRID, Jan. 27.—Spain has accepted the proposal of the United States government for the negotiation at Washington of a reciprocity treaty relating to American trade with Cuba. In political circles it is said that the only serious difficulty in the way of formulating and adopting such a treaty appears to be the American inflexibility on the tobacco question.

AN INTERVIEW WITH M'KINLEY.

BERLIN, Jan. 27.—A German newspaper in this city publishes an interview which its correspondent at Washington has had with Mr. McKinley. In this interview Mr. McKinley is represented to have said that Prince Bismarck's policy of limited protection, which had in twenty years brought Germany up to her present condition of prosperity, induced him to take up the tariff question in the United States. Mr. McKinley is also reported to have said that it was his intention to visit the ex-chancellor in order that he might personally express his admiration of that statesman and of his policy.

ALARMS THE SETTLERS.

Lake of the Woods Indians Now Performing the Ghost Dance.

HALLOCK, Minn, Special Telegram, Jan. 27.—A messenger has arrived from the Roseau country, seventy miles east of here, with a pressing petition to the governor asking for rifles and ammunition. They are in great fear of the Indians of the Lake of the Woods. The redskins are dancing and have their war paint on, and gather from all along the Rainy river and from the Canadian side. The report and petition is signed by fifty of the settlers near the scene of the excitement, and unless they are furnished with arms and ammunition it is to be feared that an outbreak will be disastrous.

Horrible Cruelty.

MILWAUKEE, Jan. 27.—While skating on a pond, Freddie Hackbarth and August Priese, both aged twelve years, were seized by two older boys, who said they wanted to "make niggers out of them." After a fire had been lighted the little fellows' faces were held over the fire until the flesh rolled off, and both may lose their sight. They will at any rate be disfigured for life. No arrests have as yet been made. The cries of the youngsters brought workmen in the vicinity to their relief, but the older ones escaped.

ONLY A FAKE.

No Truth in the Story of a Child Devil Near Howard Lake.

WAVERLY, Minn., Special, Jan. 27.—A short time ago communications appeared in the St. Paul Globe dated from Howard Lake, in which details were given of the alleged birth of a monstrosity near Plato, McLeod county. Reflections of a shameful character were cast upon the lady and it was represented that she gave birth to a child which bore a striking resemblance to the devil.

Your correspondent has taken pains to inquire into the actual facts, and for that purpose, interviewed a near relative in this village well acquainted with the people who have been so cruelly injured by these aspersions. It appears that the lady and her husband have a high standing in the community in which they live; that an early miscarriage is the only ground of the rumor, and that so far from being profane, they are exemplary Christian people.

The most curious feature of the business is that while in their immediate neighborhood no such rumors are prevalent, the dispatch in question dates from Howard Lake, over twenty miles north of where the incident is alleged to have occurred. Another suspicious feature is that the last name is given correctly, but the christian name is wrongly stated, a clear proof that the report was not sent by a well informed resident.

Letters of inquiry arrive daily at Howard, not only from this state, but also adjoining ones, and these villages are considerably worked up over the infamous scandal. Your correspondent is informed further that proceedings at law will be taken at an early day to secure an effectual vindication from the defamatory charges. Large numbers of people have visited Plato from the cities and adjoining parts who, after their abortive visit, have expressed their indignation in no measured terms.

It is understood that the fœtus has been preserved and can be used if necessary as an answer to this most unexampled and cowardly libel. The husband of the much maligned woman is determined to secure justice at whatever cost.

IT IS ALL OVER.

Gen. Miles and Staff Leave Pine Ridge for Chicago.

PINE RIDGE, S. D., Jan. 27.—Gen. Miles and staff left for Chicago to-day, leaving Col. Shafter in command at the agency.

Gen. Miles left orders for the Ninth cavalry to proceed to Fort Niobrara after the departure of the Brule Sioux for the Rosebud agency. They will be accompanied by a detachment of soldiers, as will also the Indians going to the Cheyenne River agency.

The work of disarming the Indians is to be continued. The Sixth cavalry, after conducting the Indians to Rosebud and Cheyenne River agencies is to proceed to Fort Niobrara and at the expiration of thirty days, if everything remains quiet, the First cavalry is to return to California, and at the end of sixty days Maj. Henry's command is to go to Fort Robinson.

Gen. Miles has selected the following named chiefs to go to Washington: Young-Man-Afraid-of-His-Horses, American Horse, Fire Thunder and Hump, of the friendlies, and Little Wound, Big Road, He Dog, Two Strike, High Hawk and High Pipe, of the hostiles. Some surprise is expressed over the selection, as it was thought Red Cloud would certainly go, and as Short Bull and Kicking bear have been among the most prominent hostiles many expected them to be chosen.

Gen. Miles takes with him to Chicago forty Indians, who will go to Washington later on under the care of the war department. Gen Miles desires that they should go to the capital under the care of a military officer.

The slayer of Lieut. Casey was a graduate of the Carlisle Indian school in Pennsylvania, the son of a prominent Sioux known as No Water. The murderer was about to be turned over to the soldiers to be tried and punished when the news of the murder of the Indian Few Tails reached the Indians. They made a proposition that they would deliver the murderer of Lieut. Casey if the whites would bring the murderer of Few Tails and the two should be hanged together. The soldiers did not produce the slayer of Few Tails and the Indians continued to shield the son of No Water.

PROSTRATED WIRES.

Immense Damage Done by Sunday's Snow Storm.

NEW YORK, Jan. 27.—Never before have the telegraph and telephone companies experienced such complete and absolute havoc. Out of 1,500 running out of this city the Western Union had but three wires working this afternoon. The Postal company has not a wire working from the city, while the Metropolitan Telegraph and Telephone company roughly estimates that 2,500 of its wires are laid low. The total damage to the companies mentioned which will result from this condition of affairs is estimated at $500,000. Two weeks' unceasing efforts will be required to get the wires back into the condition which existed before the storm. Between Philadelphia and New Brunswick, N. J., the wires are totally wrecked. All the Eastern wires are down between Williams' bridge and Stamford and all Western wires between Williams' Bridge and Croton Falls are in the same condition. At Pleasantville, just back of Sing Sing, every wire is down for a distance of two miles. The linemen working at Cos Cob report that all the wires at that point were found in the river. Every one of the Western Union wires which run along the line of the West Shore railroad is down south of Kingston. The Western Union wires which run through New Jersey are piled into small heaps on the Jersey flats.

The several telegraph and telephone companies which cover Brooklyn with their wires estimate their aggregate loss at $150,000. In Jersey City and Hoboken the telephone and telegraph wires hung in tangled masses from broken poles. In both these places the bell towers have again been pressed into service to be used in case of fire.

WORK OF CONGRESS.

Resume of the Important Measures Consined by Congress the Past Week.

What is Being Done by the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington.

Tuesday Jan., 20th.

SENATE.

Mr. Harris rose to a question of order and quoted Rule 40, which provides that no motion to modify, amend or suspend a rule, or part thereof, shall be in order except on one day's notice, in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified or amended, and the parts thereof.

HOUSE.

The clerk having concluded the reading, Mr. Bland made the point that the journal had not been read in full, and demanded that the description of the various executive communications, resolutions, bills and petitions, which are referred under the rules and not in open house, be read.

The speaker directed the clerk to read this portion of the journal, which is ordinarily omitted. This was by far the longest portion of the journal, and its reading was not completed until 1 o'clock.

Mr. Mills then expressed his wish to debate the question of approving the journal, but the speaker declined to recognize him, on the ground that the house was dividing. With excited gestures, Mr. Mills strode down the aisle, and shaking his fist at the speaker, poured out a volume of denunciation, accusing him of practising a fraud on the house.

"You are perpetrating a fraud upon the house," he thundered, "and you know it," And his party colleagues burst into a round of applause and cheers and gathered around the champion.

But the speaker was immovable, and, amid the excitement, requested those opposed to the approving of the journal to rise. Phlegmatically he counted "one, two, three," and announced the motion carried—97 to 3.

By this time affairs had approached so near to personal rupture between the gentlemen on the opposing sides that the speaker was obliged to call upon the sergeat-at-arms for assistance, and that officer, bearing the mace in front of him, induced Mr. Mills to take his seat, and the storm passed away for the time. The journal was approved—144 to 103.

Wednesday Jan., 21.

SENATE.

It is doubtful if the situation in the senate has ever been more hopelessly tangled than it appeared to be at 9 o'clock to-night. There were few external evidences of the real estate of the case to the unpracticed eye, for matters seemed to be proceeding in the usual routine fashion, a senator was reading in a monotonous tone of voice from long columns of printed clippings, and no one of his dozen colleagues who retained their seats in the senate chamber appeared to be paying him the slightest attention and there were no signs of the bitter struggle that is going on.

HOUSE.

The house was in a wrangle again to-day during the discussion of the approval of the journal. The journal was finally approved, after which Mr. Bland offered a substitute for a resolution to limit debate on the appropriation bills, making the free coinage silver bill a continual order from and after Jan. 27. He should, he said, insist upon that motion until the fourth of March.

Thursday Jan. 22.

SENATE.

The resolution now before the senate (the closure) will probably be debated until the Republicans secure the attendance of more of the absentees, and this they expect will be early next week. It is believed that by that time Senators Squire, Pettigrew, Pierce, Cameron, Quay, Moody and perhaps Ingalls will find their affairs in such shape that they can return to the capital.

HOUSE.

Within three or four days there has been a decided change in the temper of the house on the question of free coinage. There is not so much enthusiasm in favor of it, and instead of a general feeling that the senate bill will pass the house considerable doubt exists.

Two Democrats who have been counted as sure to favor free coinage—Mr. Vaux and Mr. Mutchler of Pennsylvania—will so far come into line with their Eastern colleagues as to refrain from voting. There are others who have been counted as sure supporters of free coinage who are now classed as doubtful.

Friday Jan. 23.

SENATE.

The senate met in connection of yesterday's session, Mr. Cockrell resumed the floor to continue his argument against the closure rule.

He yielded to Mr. Hoar, who spoke against the action of the minority in preventing legislation, after which Mr. Cockrell concludes his speech.

HOUSE.

Mr. Cooper, of Indiana, rising to a question of privilege, sent to the clerk's desk and had read a resolution offered by him in September last, making certain charges against the pension commissioner, and asking for a broadening of the investigation of that official. This resolution had been referred to the select committee examining previous charges, and on the 11 of September the chairman of that committee (Mr. Morrill, of Kansas) had been directed to report the resolution, but he had never performed that duty.

After considerable debate the matter was settled amicably by Mr. Morrill obtaining the original resolution from the files of the house, reporting it from his committee and having it referred to his committee on rules.

Monday Jan. 26.

SENATE.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27.—The senate met at noon in continuation of the legislative day of Thursday, the pending question being the resolution to amend the rules by providing a method of closing debate.

Mr. Morgan resumed the floor and continued his argument, begun on Saturday, in opposition to the proposed rule and to the elections bill, both of which measures he claimed (on the authority of the New York Times) to be for the advancement of Mr. Harrison's project for re-election.

HOUSE

WASHINGTON, Jan. 26.—The usual skirmish took place as to the reading and approval of the journal.

Mr. Boutelle of Maine moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the navy appropriation bill. The yeas and nays were ordered, and the clerk had called but a few names when Messrs. Mansur and Heard of Missouri, returning from the senate side, spoke a few words to their colleagues, whereupon Mr. Rogers of Arkansas rose and, interrupting the call, informed the house that the force bill had been defeated.

Froze Out a Rival.

DES MOINES, Jan. 27.—Two young colored men, John Watson and Robert Nash, courted the same girl, and last night both of them called on her at the same time. Watson possessed the greatest staying power and froze out Nash. Watson left about midnight, and, as he was approaching his employer's house, a shot was fired at him by some one concealed in the shadow of the porch, the bullet striking him in the forehead and inflicting a serious wound. Nash has been arrested, but denied having done the shooting.

The sinking fund, which has been accumulating for three years, amounts to about $20,000.

The whole matter grew out of the county seat fight.

As to the World's fair, it is recommended that Minnesota should make a creditable exhibit, and that $100,000 be appropriated therefor. This should be done by all means. Let us have an exhibit that will be worthy of our great state. Let there be no opposition to this. We failed in this regard at the Philadelphia centennial. We cannot afford to repeat the error.—St. Cloud Times.

In less than one hour after the audience which attended the entertainment of Maggie Mitchell's company at the opera house in Winona had left the building, it was found to be a mass of flames, and an hour later a small portion of the walls only remained. South Dakota claims more colonels than Kentucky in the proportion to population. Titles have been sprinkled indiscriminately over the militia until it is satirically said that it is a distinction to be a private.

The Sioux Falls Argus-Leader says that John J. Patton's total shortage as cashier of the penitentiary will not exceed $1,200, which will doubtless be made good by Patton's father, who is a wealthy citizen of Detroit.

An artesian well has been struck at a depth of 750 feet at Armour, which flows about 1,400 gallons per minute. The first night it inundated the south end of Main street, and lively work was required all night to get the miniature flood under control.

MINNESOTA SOLONS.

Condensed Proceedings of Both Branches of the Minnesota Legislature.

What is Being Attempted in the Way of Legislation by Our Lawmakers.

Monday, Jan, 19th.

SENATE.

Senator Lienau introduced a bill providing for state teachers' certificates. By its provisions there is to be an examining board, to consist of the state superintendent and four members appointed by the governor. This board will have charge of the examination for state certificates and the granting of the same. It may revoke a certificate at any time. There shall be two grades of these state certificates.

The bill introduced by Senator March relating to trust companies gives such corporations power to receive money on deposit and issue time certificates of deposit of same.

Senator Allen wants the alien real estate law amended. By the provisions of his bill no alien or corporation is permitted to own more than 5,000 acres of land in the state, except railway and other roadway corporations, and those engaged in the manufacture of lumber.

HOUSE.

The speaker announced his appointment of committies. An examination of the list shows that the Democrats are given a representation of 132 upon the various committees, the Alliance 90, the Republicans 103, and the one Prohibition member four places.

Mr. Currier of Blue Earth introduced H. F. 68, which is a bill to govern and regulate the rates of railroad companies in the state. This bill is modeled on the Iowa state railway law to a certain extent, and extends and defines the powers of the railroad commissioners of this state. It contains many proposed changes of an extremely radical nature, giving the railroad commissioners power to make the rates for the railroads, and providing heavy penalties for any breach of the sections of the act.

Tuesday, Jan. 20.

SENATE.

Mr. Donnelly presented a long and vigorous protest, signed by twenty-seven democratic and Alliance Senators, against the action of the president of the senate in relation to the protest of the Republican senators who objected to the novel method of selecting the committees.

Senator Phillips presented a bill which proposes an amendment to the constitution which is a step toward the realization of the single tax idea.

The bill of Senator Tawney amending the jury law does away with the practice of securing "struck" juries in ordinary cases. Ramsey and Hennepin counties are excepted from the provisions of the bill.

Senator Hompe's bill regarding land within the meandered line of lakes provides that such lands may be sold in the same manner as school lands, and the proceeds shall be devoted to school purposes.

Senator Hompe introduced bills providing for erection of private elevators upon the right of way of railroads, and also that any person may build a side track to any private elevator, warehouse or other property, at his own expense, and the railroad companies must allow the construction o switches connecting such side tracks with the main lines.

HOUSE.

Mr. Cross of Goodhue introduced an important railroad bill, granting to railroad companies the right to use the right of way of other companies under certain conditions.

Mr. Currier of Blue Earth submitted a resolution the other day to the effect that the house and senate concurring, the legislature petition congress to so amend the constitution of the United States as to have the United States senators elected by the people. This resolution was called up by Mr. Lomen of Ramsey, and in a vigorous speech Mr. Lomen opposed the passage of the resolution. Mr. Feig took an opposite view, and declared the present system of electing United States senators to be a most fertile source of corruption, alluding to the last senatorial election. Mr. Reeve spoke against the resolution, but a vote being taken it was carried by 81 to 11.

Wednesday, Jan. 21.

SENATE.

Senator March introduced a joint resolution calling for the appointment of a joint committee of two senators and three members of the house to consider the question of waterways. The idea is to have the committee investigate the feasibility of establishing waterways connecting those already in existence.

Senator Davis presented a bill which allowed all grand or petit jurors the sum of $2 and coroners and justice court jurors $1 per day and all of them 10 cents per mile for traveling expenses.

Senator Daugherty's bill relating to steam boilers provides for an inspector in each congressional district who shall inspect all boilers not subject to United States inspection.

HOUSE.

Mr Bell introduced a bill authorizing corporations organized under the laws of the state to renew at the end of the time for which they have been organized. The present law places the limit at thirty years, after which time they expire.

The question of abolishing the wolf bounties, which has been brought up by a bill introduced by Mr. Bell of Ramsey into the house, is likely to create considerable excitement. The pay of these bounties has for the past seven or eight years been a serious strain u[illegible] the state treasury. Since 1885 the amount paid out in bounties has been largely increased each year, until the annual appropriation has become entirely inadequate to meet the demands. During certain months of the year the bounty is only $3 per scalp, while during other months it is $5. It is alleged that in certain counties certain persons have been in the habit of farming wolveo, and also of keeping the wolf cubs in captivity during the months when their scalps have been only $3 until the $5 months came around. It is also alleged that wolf scalps have been imported from other states and that generally speaking the bounty system has been grossly abused.

Thursday, Jan. 22.

SENATE.

The house bill authorizing the county of Lake to issue bonds for the construction of roads was passed by the senate under suspension of the rules.

Mr. Searle called up Mr. Currier's resolution memorializing congress for the submission of a constitutional amendment allowing the election of president and vice president of the United States by a direct vote of the people, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed. It was defeated by a vote of 41 yeas to 51 nays. The resolution was then discussed and passed.

Friday, Jan. 23.

SENATE.

Senator E. R. Smith offered a resolution providing that each senator should be allowed $10 for postage. There was no discussion of the resolution, strange to say, and upon roll call the vote stood 28 in favor and 19 against the appropriation.

Senator Sanborn sent to the secretary's desk a communication from B. F. Irvine stating that he had taken care of the legislative mail for a week before a postmaster had been elected in either house, and asking that he be compensated for such services. Senator Leavitt gave notice of debate.

Senator Cramer brought up the question of furnishing the members with newspapers by a resolution allowing each senator 20 cents per day for such purpose, but it was defeated.

The committee on federal relations reported favorably upon the joint resolution urging congress to pass the Payne bill for the construction of a ship canal in New York around the Falls of Niagara. The report was adopted and the resolution passed.

Senator March's bill amending the state banking law decreases the amount of capital required for state banks.

After the speaker had announced that Mr. Price would retain his seat, the house adjourned until 2 o'clock on Monday.

Doubting a Strong Man.

On the day preceding the arrival of circus at a certain good-sized town in Ohio, a "strong man," who had a week's lay-off from the museum circuit, dropped down on a visit to some relatives. There was no discount on him as "a marvel of strength," and the wood-cut which pictured him throwing a bull over a six-rail fence was not much of an exaggeration. As soon as it was discovered that he had no particular scruples against the flowing bowl, the boys set out to have a little fun. Early in the forenoon of circus day an alleged circus man waited on "the great western giant," and intimated that he was a fraud from away back, and that his marvelous feats were tricks and delusions. This had the effect we hoped for, and four or five glasses of beer did the rest.

Soon ofter noon the strong man sailed down to the circus grounds to demand an apology. The people had begun buying tickets, and the circus officials were too busy to talk. The way they ignored his presence made the strong man madder than ever, and he started for the entrance. The two men stationed there tried to prevent his ingress, but he threw one into a farmer's wagon and the other over a lemonade stand, and entered the tent. Six of the circus men now rallied on the center, but the struggle didn't last two minutes. He flung them alow and aloft as if playing with the clubs.

"Hey, R-u-b-e!" sounded the tocsin, and every single man connected with the circus rallied in response. As they came with clubs, neck yokes and wagon-stakes the strong man looked about for some weapon. There was a long-tailed bull-dog lying under the sacred cow's cage, and he grabbed him by the tail and widened the circle and finally broke through it, smashing every man who opposed him. When clear of the circle he pushed a baby elephant off her legs, upset a a candy wagon, tore down a section of forty feet long, and appeared outside to exclaim:

"All fraud and delusion, is it? Havn't any moral right to my title, Well mebe I havn't but I guess this crowd won't dispute it!"

And he pulled the ticket wagon over on its beam ends, flung a bale of hay into a side show, and took the middle of the road tot he hotel.—N. Y.

SINGLE TAX DEPARTMENT.

TAXATION AND THE LAND VALUE TAX.

In the study of a question of so vital import to a nation as is the question of taxation, it is important that it should be investigated and weighed not only in its present aspects, but also in its historical features.

I therefore propose to present a few gleanings from history that may be of especial interest to those who look upon the land value tax as the ideal tax. Space forbids giving more than a brief glance at the subject; but it may serve as a guide to those who wish to go more fully into the matter.

The historical study of the subject of taxation is attended with some difficulty, as most historians, while recording battles and court intrigues, have paid too little attention to the economic side of history.

The idea that the earth is the common heritage of man, is as old as human intelligence, and the contributing of individuals of wealth and services to the common good as old as society. But, so far as I can discover, the idea of making every man contribute, not in proportion to his wealth, but in proportion to the value of natural or economic opportunities he controls, is a matter of modern history. Take, for instance, the Jews. They had a system of land tenure to which the lords of England could give hearty assent; for the land of a family, even if it passed from possession, reverted back each fifty years. They had a system of taxation, but it was a tenth of the actual product; not of the potential product.

The Greeks and Romans also had highly developed systems of taxation of property, occupations and individuals. In renting of the ager publicus, or public lands, like the Jews they had something akin to land value tax. In Rome the tenant of the ager publicus gave a tenth of the agricultural product to the government called decumon. The occupiers of pasture lands paid a tax on their flocks called scripton, though the rate is not known. The salt mines were rented out and the rent or tax was called salinon. The other mines were also rented out by the government.

But in passing, as we may naturally, from Rome over to England, we find that while the primitive England that succeeded Roman domination had no scientific idea of a land tax, yet they had something that was akin, though it also was based not upon control of natural opportunities, used or unused, but upon actual production. The ship tax, which might be an exception, was proportioned to population. The Danegeld was proportioned to the cultivation. When, after Norman conquest, the feudal system began to develop, the Danegeld or hidage disappeared and the carneate was employed, a Norman term of similar import. Both the hidage and carneate, from which the tax tooks its name, were a crude measure of land. The carneate was determined by what eight pair of oxen and a plow could cultivate in one season, and was probably equal to about one hundred acres.

Then came the scutage or shield tax, which the knights, who were also landlords, paid in commutation of those obligations to the crown. This was also a direct tax upon his whole property. As the English became more and more an industrial people, a large proportion of the taxes very gradually shifted upon the different forms of industry. Though in 1382, a "bad year," the "landlords paid the whole tax."

As the land owners were also the ruling classes it is easy to see how it was they gradually transferred the burdens upon industry, where it largely remains to this day.

In Cromwell's time (1656) a taxing act was passed (see Stephen Dowell's History of Taxation, vol. III., pages 76 and 77), which provides that—

The tenants of houses and lands rated to the tax are required to pay the whole tax rate to use such houses and lands; and power is given them to deduct on payment of their rent so much tax as, in respect of rent, the landlord ought to bear. This deduction all landlords, mediate or immediate, according to their respective interests, are required to allow, upon receipt of residue of rent. In short, a payment of the tax is considered pro tanto a payment of rent to the landlord. Power is given to the divisional commission to settle differences between landlords and tenants.

The word rent, though, in this act is used, not in the strict economic sense of ground rent, but in the popular sense.

According to J. Thorold Rogers ("Economic Interpretation of History," p. 457), Cromwell's heavy direct tax was thrown off as intolerable after the restoration.

In 1691 the great English philosopher, Dr. John Locke, published a pamphlet entitled "Considerations on the lowering of interest and raising the value of money."

This contains, according to Dugald Stewart, an eminent lecturer on political economy the first part of this century, the first written advocacy of a territorial tax, which was afterward developed scientifically by the great French school of physiocrats, of which Quesney was the founder.

The following extracts will show its tenor:

A tax laid upon land seems hard to the land owner, because it is so much money going visibly out of his pocket; and therefore, as an ease to himself, the landlord is always forward to lay it on commodities. But if he will thoroughly consider it and examine the effect he will find that he buys this seeming ease at a very dear rate. And although he pay not this tax immediately out of his own purse, yet his purse will find it by a greater want of money there at the end of the year than that comes to, with the lessening of his rents to boot, which is a settled and lasting evil that will stick upon him beyond the present payment.

He supports this position at length, and concludes by saying:

It is in vain in a country whose great load is land to hope to lay the public charge of the government or any thing else. The merchant, do what you can, will not bear it, the laborer can not, and, therefore, the land holders must. And whether it were not better for him to have it laid directly, where it will at last settle, than to let it come to him by the sinking of his rents, which when they are once fallen every one knows are not easily raised again, let him consider.

The farmers of New England might well ponder those lines. They might find in abandoned fields, lowered farm values a striking confirmation of their truth.

In 1692 the real estate tax, or land tax including the improvements, was re-imposed, probably in a measure as a result of the teachings of Locke. It was assessed at four shillings on the pound valuation. This tax, though it fell some years to only a shilling on the pound, remained in force until the time of Pitt, who in 1798 made it perpetual and redeemable at four shillings on the pound at the valuation of 1692. This tax remains to this day; and, though originally it was placed upon land and improvements, it has in the course of time resolved itself into a tax on economic, or ground rent only, and the only direct tax which that rent now bears in England. According to the same Dugald Stewart in 1696 Mr. John Asgill, in a treatise entitled, "Several assertions proved in order to create another species of money than gold and silver," advocates the same opinion with respect to a territorial tax. This treatise was in advocacy of a land bank proposed to the House of Commons in 1693 by a Dr. Hugh Chamberlayne. I will make but a brief quotation:

Man deals in nothing but earth. The merchants are the factors of the world to exchange one part of the earth for another. The King himself is fed by the labors of the ox; and the clothing of the army and the victualing of the navy must all be paid for to the owners of the soil as the ultimate receivers.

Stewart also quotes Jacob Vanderbilt's pamphlet, "Essay to make money plentiful," published in 1734.

If all taxes were taken off goods, and levied on lands and houses only, the gentlemen would have more net rent left out of their estates than they have now, when taxes are almost wholly levied on goods. That land gives all we have would be self-evident, if we did not import many goods which are the produce of other nations. But this makes no alteration in the case, since the quantity of foreign goods which we import can not continually be of greater value than the goods we export; because this in the end must exhaust our cash, and so put an end to that excess. Therefore, the goods we import stand only instead of those we export; and, consequently, the land gives not only all we have of our own produce, but virtually all we receive from other nations. * * * That the land must pay all taxes in what manner soever they may be levied; a proposition which might perhaps be assumed as virtually implied in a self-evident truth, that what gives all must pay all.

Mr. Vanderbilt goes on to elaborate his views regarding taxation at length. Thus, commencing with Locke, we have really the crude presentation of the single tax upon land stated in the language of that day. But there was soon to arise in France a school of economists, the physiocrats, characterized by great scholarship and wonderful intellectual ability, unsurpassed in unselfish devotion to humanity, which should bring economics into scientific form, and should urge with great earnestness and power the "import unique," or single tax.—James Middleton, New Orleans, La., in The Standard.

Lecky on Ireland.

Lecky, the historian, writes in the same magazine about "Ireland in the light of History." The article is principly remarkable for ignoring the land question as a cause of trouble. Mr. Lecky thinks the disturbed state of that country is primarily due to the fact that the conquest of Ireland under Elizabeth took place just after the reformation. He says that the result of this was that the conquerors became Protestants, and the conquered remained Roman Catholics, but that, nevertheless, all breaches might have been healed by a union of the countries about 1700. He does not explain how this could have reconciled the religious differences.

The land question shows itself, nevertheless, in such incidental phrases as the following: "When population pressed closely on subsistence the system of middlemen produced a fierce competition, which raised rent in the lower grades to an enormous height." It would be more consistent were the disturbances attributed to the ownership of the land by Protestants whose tenants are Roman Catholics.

A COUNTRY CLUB.—The handsome new home of the Union County Country Club was opened to visitors on the last day of the old year, and it is described as one of the most attractive buildings of the kind in that portion of New Jersey lying adjacent to New York. Its casino is one of the prettiest play-houses imaginable, and there are, in addition, billiard-rooms, bowling alleys, tennis courts and a fine library, all furnished in the most artistic and luxurious style. One might suppose from all this that the farmers of New Jersey are amazingly prosperous, but those who read the description to the end found tacked to it a modest announcement that most of the members of the club are New York business men. When real countrymen can enjoy the privileges of country clubs, even approximating this in convenience and elegance, there will be less complaint of the disposition of farmers' sons to come to the cities and try to be business men.

Place 100 men on an island from which there is no escape, and whether you make one of these men the absolute owner of the other ninety-nine, or the absolute owner of the soil of the island, will make no difference either to him or to them.

In the one case, as the other, the one will be the absolute master of the ninety-nine—his power extending even to life and death, for simply to refuse them permission to live upon the island would be to force them into the sea.—Progress and Poverty.

"We always expect our loved absent," she answered gravely, "so long as they live. At this moment he is not here, because he scorns to give his parole, as if confession of some guilt."

"He need have no fear"——

"Pardon me!" madame broke in coldly. "No Latour has ever known fear!"

"I meant in my awkwardness," the federal soldier replied, with difficulty restraining a smile, "to convey that there would be no difficulty about his return. Pray write to Adrien, madame, that I have sufficient influence at headquarters to guarantee this."

"Again you make us your debtors, monsieur. Soon the family of Latour will be beggared in expression, though not in appreciation."

"But you will write to him?" Dale persisted. "I love him, madame, as you do; he is the only brother I have ever known. I would urge nothing unworthy of his honor or his name."

"Monsieur, I believe you!" The four words were quietly spoken, but a volume could have expressed no more than their tone.

"I thank you, madame," Everett answered frankly. "Then I will intrude no longer. Believe me, I realize how strange it must seem to you to receive a stranger, unintroduced, beneath your roof, especially one in uniform. But now you understand the intrusion?"

"I do, monsieur," she answered, frankly, "and thank you from my heart. Were things different I should— But adieu, monsieur!" And with genuine feeling madame extended the slim, patrician hand, firm and unwrinkled, though blue veined with age.

Dale Everett bent his fair head and lightly pressed his lips upon it, as loyal vassal might have touched his suzeraine's. In the door way he paused.

"Do me the grace to remember, madame," he said, "that if I can ever serve you, or yours, you have but to command me. These are uncertain times; and my quarters are not far away—the old Piggott residence."

"I think I have heard the name," madame answered, doubtfully.

"But you know the house? 'Tis only only one block beyond Canal street."

"I have never crossed Canal street," she said simply. "But, should need come, Felicite might find it. So, again I thank you. Adieu, Monsieur le General."

Dale Everett hastened down the stairs and through the door the mulatress ceremoniously held open. Once more in the street he drew a long breath of relief.

"The delicious old bigot!" he muttered. "Lived here nearly a century and doesn't know a word of English! Would start for Europe as I'd go down to dinner, and has never crossed Canal street! By Jove! it is sublime!"

Taking the rein from the orderly the young general lifted himself into the saddle with the light swing of a perfect horseman, as he added, with a laugh:

"But I never paid quite so long a visit before without being offered a seat!"

The chestnut Kentucky thoroughbred reared and plunged without a check from the light bridle hand, that could be firm as steel, and as cruel, at need.

"Steady, Bennie! So—girl! So—o—o!" And the mare, obedient to word and knee, came down to a springy walk, only the tossing head and foam flecked bit telling her impatience.

"Cameron," called the general, turning in saddle to address his orderly, "have you taken a turn beyond camp since we got in yesterday?"

"A rather good bit, sir," replied the brawny young Scot, touching his spur and moving nearer the left flank of the other horse.

"Is there any level ground for a good gallop in easy reach?"

"Yes, sir. One long, level stretch, but rather rough in places. Seems like it had been an old field in parts; and there's some old rifle pits and ugly ditches."

"Did Jonathan have his exercise after morning stables?"

"Yes, sir. Finerty led him a good run over that same field."

"Was he very fresh?"

"Well, sir, kind o' fresh. He tore off Stable Sergeant Rooney's scales and kicked in the side of the headquarters ambulance. But it was only play, sir."

The general reflected a moment, still half turned in his saddle. Then he said:

"Saddle him after dinner call. I will ride the mare out to camp and give him a gallop myself."

There was a sudden snort of terror; a wild, squatting shy to the left, almost across the narrow street. Another rider had been dashed headlong over the mare's right shoulder, sitting as Everett was. But he was a horseman by intuition, not by rule. The first quiver of the mare had turned him in the deep saddle and gripped her with knees of iron, while a firm hand bore on the heavy bit. A second later she was still, but trembling in every muscle; her forefeet planted, and her wide eyes and quivering nostrils turned pitiably toward a hideous Pierrot, all white flutter and scarlet bows, who had suddenly emerged from a narrow court.

"So, girl! Steady! So-o-o, now!" And, patting her arched neck with his right hand, while the left held firm the tense head, her rider glanced up and saw the cause of trouble.

"You should be careful how you flaunt your foolery before people's horses!" he said to the Pierrot, with not unnatural irritation.

The masker took two quick steps forward, pose and gesture indicating full intent to retort in kind. Suddenly he stopped in midstep, the expressionless white mask seeming to stare at the rider, so strained was the tension of head and neck. Then, drawing himself up, the Pierrot stood one instant at "attention!" gave the officers' salute, and with a quick right about strode back into the court.

Everett looked after him.

"That man is a soldier and an officer," he muttered. "He can't be one of ours; the orders forbid— By Jove! he's the same the major ran over in the market. Well, it is only a coincidence." And giving the mare her head he never drew rein until he reached the headquarters of the department of Louisiana.

He was not long detained in the general's ante-room before an aid advanced from the private office and ushered him into the presence all powerful, at that moment, for weal or woe to the sovereign commonwealth. Scarce ten minutes elapsed before he reappeared, followed this time by the general himself.

"I heartily approve of it," the latter was saying, and all who came in contact with the blunt and manly cavalry leader knew at once that what he said he meant. Prompt decision in every situation and emphatic assertion of it—not always in the choicest language—was the general's strong point.

"Yes, I heartily approve it," he repeated. "You not only have my consent, but my very best wishes with it. Damn it, general, were I a youngster like you, I should feel about it as you do."

"I thank you heartily, sir," Everett answered. "But please understand, I would not care to have the matter canvassed until the latest moment possible under regulations."

"That's all right. Belton shall see to that," the bluff veteran replied. "Good-by and good luck to you!" And with a warm grasp of the hand the two parted.

When the clatter of hoofs died away from madame's ears an unusual smile visited those proud old lips.

"He is a true man," she said aloud. "He recalls my boy, unlike as the two are. He has the same grand air, the same frank bravery, the same deference. Yes, he is a gentleman—gentil tout plein! And soon he will be here, my boy! my Adrien! Ah! I shall grow young again seeing him!"

She paced the floor with firm step and head erect, the color mantling in her cheeks and her eyes flashing toward the portiere of the back room, as ever and again she paused to listen. At last a light step flew across the hall, the portiere was brushed aside and Adrien—still the Pierrot in all save mask and cape—folded her in his arms.

"Maman!"

"Adrien!"

Only two little words; but they blended with a lavish love and tenderness that told the whole long story of waiting—of suspense—of perfect joy!

At length she released her embrace, holding him off at arms' length with hands pressed against his cheeks, and eager, loving gaze searching for every thought behind the deep, tender eyes.

"At last!" she whispered. "Ah, my boy, it has been so long!"

"And to me, maman! Figure to yourself how time must have dragged for the exile, far from the home he loves, and that home the prey of the stranger!"

"But thou, Adrien, wert busy; hand and brain and heart were occupied; while I, with nothing to do but think—and long for thee! Ah! but this meeting pays for all! Come, my child, sit near and tell me everything that has fared with thee."

Dropping on a low stool near the carved arm chair the strong soldier folded his arms across her lap and looked up, in her eyes with the pure love of childhood. Rapidly he ran over the details and perils of his escape from federal scouts, his passage of the Rio Grande by night, and his adhesion to the falling fortunes of the weaker Mexican faction. But his narrative omitted all note of that personal prowess which had gained him the sobriquet "el Gringo immortal," so reckless had been his exposure in scout and skirmish. His party defeated, his troops scattered, and a price set upon his head, their leader had made the river by a forced night ride and crossed just in time to elude capture.

"And to what end?" he ended, rising and pacing the floor. "I escape enemies there to meet others here—worse ones because of my own race! If I am recognized I will be a prisoner, for I will never take their parole."

"So I have just told him—your friend, Dale Everett," madame answered; and she detailed the latter's visit, and did justice to his warm words for his friend.

"Dear old Dale! Ever true as steel!" Adrien said feelingly. "Clemence told me he was here, but I could not guess the reason of his visit. Is he not a grand fellow, maman? I could not resist risking a look at him there—perhaps for the last time. And again, just as I came here, this hideous disguise almost crazed his mare. Ah! had I only known as I do now I might have made myself known, I should never have doubted, but these times make one doubt even himself. But years and the bitterness of war have not changed dear old Dale. Before I leave, maman, I must see him some way. Night and the Carnival will be safeguards enough. And, maman, when I am gone let him come to you to advise and protect. You will—no?"

Madame hesitated. "With that uniform! Ask the enemy of our country to sit beneath the roof of the Latours!"

"But, dear, he is not the enemy; he has just proved himself our best friend. He has been everything to me for years, and, thinking me far away, he would now replace me with you. He shall come—may he not?"

"Not because my spoiled child begs it so much as because he has forced me to confess him worthy," madame replied, drawing herself up to full height. "I will forget his coat and receive him as the friend of our house."

There is no humility so touching as true pride confessing its error, and as Latour pressed his lips on his grandmother's brow, the glow on her face brought back more vividly than ever before the beautiful portrait of Adrienne Constance Latour, nee d'Auvigne, the bride of 20, which bore the signature "La Roche, Paris, 1798."

When the twain had talked in words and in that soundless communion of kindred souls, sweeter still and equally intelligible, until the shades of evening fell, madame rose. Doors were securely locked, heavy shutters closed and curtains dropped in the front of the seemingly deserted and somber house. But within were festival and joy and light. The grand old dining room was ablaze with wax tapers in their strange old sconces. The best plate—handed down for generations and bearing the old crest—shone on the board, while a flask of the rarest in the famous cellar had been brought to welcome the heir to his home again.

Madame, touched with the rejuvenation of joy, watched every movement of her boy with yearning, loving eyes. To please him she would have fired the house and all it contained, watched it burn with a smile and gone beggared into exile with him. And, talking as only love famished men talk when back once more amid the joys of home, Adrien Latour at length said:

"Ah, maman, this is an hour that pays for many a bitter day! Only the exile knows the sweetness of the home love. At last I am happy, perfectly content. So let us drink to my best friend, maman—to my brother!"

"Certainly, my child. We will drink to him."

Felicite filled the glasses. Adrien raised his.

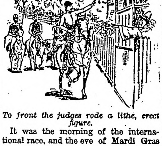
"Health and the happiness he deserves to Gen. Everett!"

And madame answered cordially as she touched hers to her lips:

"Health and happiness to Monsieur Everett!"

PART II—CHAPTER III.

IN THE LISTS.



To front the judges rode a lithe, erect figure.

It was the morning of the international race, and the eve of Mardi Gras as well, and the double excitement made New Orleans busy by early dawn.

No more balmy and delicious day could be remembered, even among the many delicious ones that glorify late winter in the gulf region. The soft, fleecy haze over sunrise was nature's pledge that noon would be clear, but not too warm. The gulf breeze crept lazily up the river loaded with pilfered sweets of the orange and early jasmines, fanning away reminders from those stagnant ditches which make sewerage a satire in the Crescent city.

At the early restaurants, about hotel lobbies, in the chaffer with intolerant cabmen—even among the working girls hurrying to early tasks—the race was the absorbing topic of talk.

It was a semi-military affair, being under the patronage of the commanding general, though not in his official capacity. A noted horseman himself, and a true lover of the sport, he had stepped into the breach left by the failure of the Orleans Jockey club to reorganize. Still, as the race was to be run over the old Metairie course, a small committee of the older turfmen were overseeing its details, perhaps to avoid violation of their track traditions. But they had refused with courteous firmness to act as stewards of the track. Their spokesman had said:

"We go little into public now, most of us having lost relatives in the war, and the rest sympathizing with the grief of our friends. Our track and our experience are heartily at the public's service, general, but our inclinations we must beg to reserve."

So the general was fain to be satisfied; and so he told them. However, he remarked to an adjutant general that he didn't understand those Creole fellows, anyhow. And the blunt soldier's statement was literally true; for had more commanders understood them better—had the present one been nearly so much of a statesman as he had proved himself a dashing soldier—the 14th of September had not been red lettered in the calendar by the spilling of blood.

Shortly after sunrise the committee was at the course. The superintendent informed them that just at dawn a stranger had ridden in and tried the jumps.

"I refused him," the man added, "till he showed me a permit from Gen. Sheridan, as the American entry."

No one had heard even a hint of such an entry; but the opinion of all was voiced by Antoine Lamotte.

"Plucky, rather," he said in French. "But, poor devil! he'll wish himself at Bull Run again when Chivrac shows him the heels of that magnificent stallion L'Empereur!"

"Did he give his name and rank?" asked Mr. Beniston of the club.

"No, sir. He was a young un—a leftenant, I should say from his age. I got into the judges' stand with my glass, but it was too hazy to tell much about his chances."

"He has no showing, Beniston," Judge Landry said.

"None in the world; he enters too late," was the confident answer. "Chavirac must beat him."

"It is perhaps not treason to say that I shall not be bitterly disappointed if he do," put in Lamotte.

"Nor I," Beniston added. "He is not riding for—us!"

But the news of the new element in the race—and it soon spread over the city, as news ever does in public excitement, none knows how—added fresh zest to the event. About the camps inquiry was universal. But no man knew of any comrade likely to risk his neck and reputation, at once, in a start without practice in a race like this.

"I'm a patriot of long standing," remarked our major of Green Perch restaurant knowledge as he breakfasted at Victor's. "My respect for the old flag is punctuated by an escopet ball and my love for it not dampened by slow promotion in the Q. M. D. But I'll bet you a case of Cliquot, Barnes, that our man is not as good as third in the race."

"Done!" cried Col. Barnes, of the infantry. "I'm not the horseman you are, major, but I'm Cape Cod born, and you can't bluff my belief in Yankee pluck."

And the major's estimate was about that of the public. The Yankee hadn't a ghost of a show, everybody said, and for reasons already indicated almost everybody said sotto voce that he was deuced glad of it!

By noon about all New Orleans had turned its face eastward, crossing the main boulevard—Canal street—en route for the old Metairie race course, which lies some two miles beyond the northern limits of the city. Great crowds of pedestrians of all classes and both sexes filled the pavements, and everything that had wheels, from the butcher's wagon and confectioner's cart to the stylish drag or stately family coach, was passing into the French quarter.

Spite of a certain reticence—of a real distaste, or of contempt for the "Yankee holiday"—which kept many behind closed shutters it was evident that the race was vastly popular, and that the stands would be taxed to fullest measure. And very gay and pretty looked those stands when filled, the bright bonnets and gay dresses of the ladies contrasting strongly with the black coats and very frequent uniforms, while over all was a fluttering mass of gaudy parasols, almost every one knotted with the colors of a favorite rider. The tricolor predominated largely, for the sympathies of the city went with their race, and the count, besides, was a noted "crack" in gentlemen's races. The German and British colors, too, were frequently seen; and La Vega's green and gold knot was shown on many sides. But the colors of the Union were nowhere to be found. Few of the crowd knew surely the truth of the rumor they had heard; none knew the name of the champion of the flag; and even had they, no time had been given for even the most loyal to procure his colors.

Just before 8 o'clock, however, the omission elsewhere was made more pointed. A landau dashed rapidly up to the grand stand, followed by a couple of carriages. The commanding general, an aid and several ladies alighted, as the sentries at the gates presented arms, and passed into the seats reserved by the committee. The general wore citizen's dress, but on the front of the Prince Albert, struggling with its buttons across his already burly figure, fluttered a huge knot of red, white and blue. And still longer ones floated from the parasols of the ladies with him.

All eyes were fixed on the general's party and followed it to its station, but many a pair of lips curled into a smile, or something more meaning, and many a muttered remark, generally in French, referred to the lonesomeness of the American rider's backers.

Precisely at 8 o'clock the clear note of a bugle cut the air. In an instant it stilled the thousand tongues buzzing like a world of bees in convention to nominate a queen. A dead hush fell upon the vast throng in stands and quarter stretch; the bookmakers stopped short, and the maskers jerked off their false faces to see better. Every eye was turned toward the stable gates, through which emerged a group of riders, goodly to see as they pranced down the stretch.

Count de Chavirac kept well in hand a magnificent blood bay, tall and long coupled and clean limbed, as warranted by his pedigree. For L'Empereur's sire had twice won the Prix de Paris before he was retired to the imperial stables, and his dam had once made a good third on Epsom Downs. A trifle too much daylight showed under him, but his springy step and the power spoken in his deep, flat flanks promised great speed under pressure. The count's rather pronounced jockey suit of tricolor satin shone in the sun, and from the rosette on his cap flashed an immense diamond. But there was nothing of the fop about his pose in the saddle, his bridle hand controlling—a trifle needlessly, perhaps—every impulse of the noble brute beneath him.

In peculiar contrast Capt. Hoyne-Cecil rode by his side. A low blue rowing shirt displayed the fair skin below the tan on his brawny neck, and its short sleeves showed the play of muscles in arms fair as a woman's. Buckskin breeches and riding boots made up the simple costume, topped only by a black skull cap. His mount was a massive thoroughbred, with keen, small head, and muscled front and rear like the horses of Achilles, as he tossed a mane like theirs from a neck rather heavy for the fancy of a keen point judge. His chestnut coat was as shining as his neighbor's, but the impression he made was rather of stay and good power over the hurdles than of peculiar fleetness on the flat.

From the Thirteen Towns.

The subject of county division is of such vital importance to all the people of the county that it should receive fair and impartial discussion by the press, into which local prejudices, jealousies and self-interest should not be allowed to enter in the least, and the matter should be fairly, truthfully and impartially laid before the public, yet the very opposite to this is being done by certain papers who have always been crying the loudest against the real or fancied wrongs of the farmers, and it is well for these papers that printers' ink is black so that it cannot blush for any lies they may tell. For instance, the Crookston Journal in it's last week's issue stated deliberately that the farmers were all opposed to dividing the county into 2 or 4 parts, because they were not in favor of increasing their taxes so many times; a statement which is absurbed and false on the face of it, and an unwarranted insult to the farmers of the county, not one whom we believe ever was so idiotic as to utter such a sentiment to the so-called editor of the Journal nor any of his brilliant staff of reporters, and this assertion is about on par with similar statements made by other papers of presumably good repute, from the company of which of course the Journal is excused. We do not believe that there is a farmer in Polk county so ignorant as to credit for any instant such a gross fabrication. By what process of reasoning they reach such a conclusion would certainly puzzle the chief justice and all of the associate justices of the United States supreme court. By the same process of reasoning they would say that it costs as much to run the state of Deleware as the state of New York, or the running expenses according to their reasoning would be the same in the city of Crookston as in the city of Chicago, World's fair and all, or they would say that a corporation employing the same number of men on different parts of the construction of machines, say, the wood, steel and paint work, of a binder, decide to place each of said departments separately, which is frequently done, it would cost as much to run each separately as it did all three combined. Of course such a statement would be ridiculed by all sensible people, but no less ridiculous is the statement that should the county be divided into 2 or 4, the taxes of the farmers would be so many times greater. Then if this is so, the running expenses of Kittson, Norman and other small counties must be the same as that of Polk. We have before us the financial statement of Kittson county for last year, and from it we glean that the total amount expended for all purposes during the year was a trifle over fourteen thousand dollars, and out of this was paid about two thousand dollars for interest on bonds, and one thousand dollars for taxes refunded and commission for collecting the seed grain loan, which is no part of the ordinary running expenses of the county, which would leave the total running expenses at about eleven thousand dollars for one year, and we will venture to say that it costs Polk county considerable more than four times that amount ever year. The fees and salaries received by the county officers in that county amount to a trifle over seven thousand dollars, while in Polk county it amounts to considerable over thirty thousand dollars. It costs six hundred dollars to run the district court a year there, and at least six times that much in Polk county, and the same is true of Norman county, Now if Polk county was divided into four, each would be about the size of one of these counties, and it would cost no more to administer their affairs and the taxes wouldnt be as high as now We have talked with a large number of farmers from Norman county, and we have yet to find a man who dose not say that taxes are smaller now than they were before they were set off from this county, and why shouldn't the same state of affairs exist with us if we were cut off? No earthly reason exists why it should not, and then we could pay our taxes and transact our other county business witout unnecessary expense and loss of time and a host of other inconyeniences that exist at present.

Our District.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31.—The present Minnesota legislature holds in the hollow of its hand the fate of two prominent Republican congressional candidates in the North Star state.

If the legislature succeeds in passing a fair apportionment bill at this session there is every possibility that S. G. Comstock, of Moorhead, and Col. C. G. Graves, of Duluth, will be candidates for congress, in what is now the big Fifth district, in 1892. All this will depend, of course, upon the manner in which the present Fifth district is divided. If Duluth is flocked into one district by herself, and Moorhead in another, Graves and Comstock are pretty sure to be in the field for nominations in their respective districts. It is apparant, of course, that if the state is gerrymandered by the present Demo-Alliance combine so that it will be an impossibility to elect a Republican in either district, Messrs Graves and Comstock will not be congressional candidates two years hence. It is not doing either of these gentelmen any injustice to say that they will watch the outcome of the present legislative session with a great deal of intirest. And it is not unfair to Mr. Comstock to say that he does not think that his constituents treated him at all fairly in the last election. It has gone down into history that Mr. Comstock secured more for his district in the present congress than any other man it ever had. The landslide retired him to private life for the time being, but it would be well for the people in the northern part of the state to keep an eye on Sol Comstock. He is too good a man to leave at home when that section of the country needs so much at the hands of the goverment. And Col Graves would make a good man for Duluth and the surrounding country to have in the lower house of the national congress. He is an excellant legislator, as experience in the Minnesota legislature has proved, and he is ably fitted to represent his district in the national house. The Journal correspondent is aware of the fact that Comstock and Graves have talked over the situation in this city during the the past few days. It the legislature evoles a fair apportionment bill, it's not at all improbable that these geutleman would be willing to make the race two years hence. Mr. Comstock will make no great effort to secure a nomination. If it comes to him without great friction he will probably accept. The same can be said to be true with regard to Col. Graves.

A Preventive For Prairie Fires.

The prairie burner is made of light boiler iron firmly fastened together with bolts. It is in the dome shape of an inverted capital U, five feet in width, four feet high and eight feet in length, and weight about 1,300 pounds. Two horses can handle it on level ground, but four horse are the most economical as they can travel faster and do more work. The front section, or burner proper, has a tank holding the gasoline. From the tank run pipes to the generators, and from the generators, there are four perforated pipes, like tines on a fork, and through these the gas is generated; it is forced to the ground by draft, caused by an apron just above the perforated tines or pipes, and, as there are four groups of these pipes in what may be termed the fire-box, it gives a solid, intense flame, five feet in width, heating the front section so that it is uncomfortably hot on the sides for 10 feet distant. A smoke-stack surmounts this section to carry off the smoke. In the rear of this section is a fan, blowing a current of air against the flame, operating similar to a high wind on the prairie. Following the burner are the "trailers," or hollow sections, same size and shape as the burner, and down each side and across the rear end are placed gunny sacks or green hides, with a shovelful of dirt to weight them down, and these are wet occasionally, to deaden any burning grass that the uneven surface of the ground may allow to escape. The trailers are used, either three or four, according to the speed desirable—the more trailers the faster the teams can be driven. Two men can handle the machine, bat three are needed for fast work, one to drive and two to attend the burner. The cost of gasoline is from 10 to 20 cents a mile. and the burner, with four horses, can travel easily two to three miles an hour, burning off bare as a floor, and leaving it completely free from danger, a strip five feet in width. Another strip can be burned 20 feet distant, and than back fire, or burn out, the intervening grass, giving a 40 foot fire break.

The machines are well made and at present cost to manufacture from $105 to $175 each. It is the invention of Attorney E. C. Rice, who has patented the same in this country and Canada. He is now at work improving ths machine, and will put out a better machine the coming season.

Census Figures.

The last census bulletin puts the population of the United States at 62,622,250. Indians added, 33,000,000. In 1880 the population was 50,155,783. The absolute increase the last ten years intervening was 12,466,456. The population of Minnesota June 1, 1890, was 1,301,826; in 1885, it was 1,17,798; in 1880, 780,773. Minnesota increased 78 per cent between 1830 and 1890, the numerical increase being over half a million in the last decade. The state census taken in 1885 shows that the bulk of this increase occurred between 1880 and 1885. The numerical increase during the first five years was 337,025, and the rate of increase 43 per cent., while during the last half of the decade the numerical increase was 184,026 and the rate of increase 16.5 per cent. Minnesota ranks, in respect to relative population, the 20th in order of the states and territories. The order, down to Minnesota, is, New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Missouri, Massachussetts, Texas, Indiana, Michigan, Iowa Kentucky, Georgia, Tennessee, Wisconsin, Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, New Jersey, Kansas, Minnesota. There are twenty-seven beneath us.

In the course of the settlement and devlopment of a country the industries commonly follow one another in a certain order. After the hunter, trapper, and prospector, who are commonly the pioneers, the herdsman follows, and for a time the raising of cattle is the leading industry. As settlement becomes less sparse, this is followed by agriculture, which in its turn, as the population becomes more dense, is succeeded by manufactures, and, as a consequence, the aggregation of the people in cities. We see in this country all stages of this progress.

AFTER FORTY YEARS.

"It was in the Fall of '47 that three young fellows left Rochester for the west, determined to hew out their fortunes or perish in the attempt," said one of the party of four or five who were gathered in the cabin of a lake propeller, bound down, one stormy night. One or two of the number had stemmed the monotony and broken the ice toward a freer feeling by rehearsing some light anecdotes and reminiscences, when a gray haired, rotund gentleman ventured as above. All attention was given him, and he then continued:

"As I was one of them I will be more personal and say that we were strong, well built specimens of manhood and any amount of grit, and we had also made up our minds to be fully independent of the world and of each other. We went together from Buffalo to Detroit by boat. Arriving at Detroit and spending a day or two in looking about we then after consultation concluded to part company and each go it in the direction he thought best.

"This may seem rather queer, for young men to start out together with common interests and then to switch around and go it alone, but it was a freak of young minds. It had something odd and romantic about it that struck us favorably.

"Before parting we agreed to return to our old home at Rochester in forty years, if our lives were spared. This was putting it a long ways ahead, but this was only another freak.

"Well, as before said, I am one of the three, and am now on my way to Rochester in fulfilment of the agreement made. I don't know whether I shall see the others or not. I have never heard a word from either of them, and really do not know whether to think they are dead or alive."

While this was being said a young man, who had been trying to read by the dim, flickering light put aside his book and strained eagerly to catch every word uttered by the story teller.

"It might, in view of this, continued the man with gray hairs, "be interesting to you, gentlemen, to have a brief sketch of what has happened to me since that time of my separation from my comrades—now almost forty years ago."

"Yes, yes, let us have it," they all cried.

The old gentleman moved himself into a more comfortable position, while the young man edged himself a little closer to the group.

"Well, I struck straight north, took a boat for Mackinaw and from there drifted to Green Bay, Wis. There was nothing of Green Bay then, but I saw some good land, and by wiggling around I managed to get hold of some of it. I then held on; it was pretty hard work sometimes, but I never let that land go, and as a result it is worth many thousands of Uncle Sam's big silver dollars. But that is only on one line, and is a little out of order. I started a little supply store in Green Bay when it first began to develop, and as I was having moderate success I soon got me a wife.

Well, we paddled along without much occurring until one day a fellow came into my store, said he was a lumberman and ordered a heavy bill of goods. He then went out, and in a few hours returned considerably intoxicated and wanted to borrow $10. I of course could not let him have it, for I had not had time to look up who my customer was, and feared he might be trying to swindle me. Upon my refusing his request he became very much enraged, and commenced shooting at me with a big pistol he carried. In defense of myself I seized a loaded gun that was standing in a corner, and in the heat of the moment, I discharged it toward him, and was immediately horrified to see him fall and die at once.

"Well, to make a long story short, I was exonerated from all guilt by the authorities; and yet every little while I heard some one whisper or look and point toward me, and it made me feel very uneasy. So I finally decided to 'pull up stakes' and go further west. About this time, however, I was drafted into the military service—the war had just begun—and went through the whole campaign, leaving behind those two fingers"—holding up his hand for inspection—"and bringing out the long scar on the back of my head.

"I then went west again, picked up my family and struck into the grazing district of Montana. I bought a few head of cattle at first, and by care I have been able to see these multiply, until now I have one of the largest and most successful cattle ranches in that section of the country. I have seen all kinds of 'roughing it' out there, and may say that I have had many adventures of varied nature. I am now 64 years old and bid fair to see 94, as far as my general bodily health is concerned.

"Such is, briefly, my life, and what it has done; and you don't know how anxious I am to learn of those other two young men—and to know the result of their forty year struggle."

This was in an interesting and pleasant tone, and had just been finished when the young man who had been listening intently stepped forward, and addressing himself to the little old gentleman said politely:

"Excuse me, sir; but may I ask your name?"

"Certainly, sir—certainly," was replied, and the old gentleman gave his full name.

"Then, sir," said the young man, "I want to grasp your hand, for you are my father's old friend, and I am now on my way to Rochester to find a gentleman of your name and bearing your history."

"What!" exclaimed the old timer, exhibiting great surprise; "you don't mean to say that you are the son of one of those two lost ones—one of the two associated with me in that freak of forty years ago?"

"Yes, sir," said the tall young fellow. "That is just what I mean."

"Well, well. Just step here where the light will show better. Yes, I see a dsitant resemblance. You certainly look very much like that hearty young companion of mine forty years ago; very much, in fact, as I have almost expected to see him—though I know that over half a lifetime has passed by. But your father—tell me of him at once," and the little old man began to get fidgety.

They relaxed their grasp of each other's hands and sat down together, while the others gave every attention.

"My father is dead," began the young man.

"What!" said the sire at his side!

"Yes, my father, and the companion of your younger days is no more. He passed away four years ago, and on his dying bed he gave me the instructions I am now carrying out. It was the one wish of my fathers's ltter life to be able to take the eastern trip to Rochester to meet the other two members of that party you have told of. It was on his mind a great deal.

"When my father died he was one of the most prominent men on the Pacific slope. He had figured in all the great political events since 1860, and occupied many positions of public worth, He was attracted toward California by the great gold panic, and had a very venturesome, yet not unpleasant, trip overland, for it was before the railroad came.

"He became early interested in the fisheries of the northern coast, and during a visit to those grounds was taken captive by a roving band of Indians and held for over a year. He finally succeeded in making his escape; but was in the mountains for months; at last, and by the merest chance, getting to the coast again, and so on back to San Francisco. He became cashier in a bank, and while in this position married the daughter of the bank's president. It was not long after this before my father found himself president of the bank, which was the largest of its kind on the Pacific Coast.

"It was then that my father began his public career, and he continued to rise in worldly station until his death came. I am now one of the officers of the bank of which my father was for years president, and have large and pressing interests to oversee, yet I have left all for a time—for the sole purpose of following out the wishes—I may almost say last wishes—of my father relative to this trip to Rochester and the hunting up of the other two of that original little party of forty years ago. I have some momentoes with me that father put aside for those he expected to meet this year at Rochester, and now I am afraid that we will have to unite our powers in an effort to find No. 3 of the original party."

Just then a violent stamping was heard in one of the little staterooms on one side of where the narrators and their small body of listeners were seated. Then two or three sharp kicks came against the door, followed by:

"Consarn it! if I hadn't got sech infernal tight boots, jest t' go down't Rochester in, I wouldn't hey t' kick th' infernai legs off'n me when I wanted t' put them on."

Then there came a great bang, with a "Thar, by gol!"

Immediately thereafter a tall, thin, straight haired old fellow opened the door of the room from which the noise had come and, minus collar and with one trowser leg caught on the top of his boot, he stood in the dim glare of oscillating light and looked with bewilderment toward the wonderisg ones about the table.

"Ken any of you fellers tell me ef I've been a dreamin'?" he inquired after a moment or two had passed.

"I don't believe we can, uncle," said one of the number.

"Hev you fellers been a tellin' yarns?" he again asked, without much attention to the answer just received.

The little old gentleman ventured to say that they had been considering some old time events.

"Then I ain't been dreamin'; I knowed I was awake. Say, which one of you was tellin' that last story?" he asked; and upon the young man acknowledging that he was the one the old fellow said:

"Put her right thar, then, for I knowed your dad;" then turning toward the group he inquired:

"Now, who was it thet told the first yarn 'bout those three chaps?"

"The little old gentleman bobbed up, prepared by his former surprise to have almost anything happen.

"Then," ejaculated the old fellow, his disheveled hair and sparkling eyes indicating much excitement, "I'll be clubbed and skinned fer a sneakin', wild eyed rattlesnake ef I ain't trer missin' link. I'm one of ther same crowd thet seperated at Detroit away back that in '47, an' I'm jest on my way—M'linder ,n' I—dowu t' Rochester t' shake hun's all eround ag'in. By the great whale that eat up thet feller Job, but this is er coincerdence."

After further expressions of surprise on the part of each the tall old man was calmed down sufficiently to tell his story, which was as follows:

"Wall, boys, I jest went back a few miles an' sat right down on 160 acres of as fine land as lay out of doors, an' thar I've been a-settin' ever since, except when I gettin' 'bout a clearin' off all th' timber, pullin' out th' stumps, an' fencin', an' buildin' house an' barns an' doin' th' hundred things that come in a feller's way on a farm. Of course I got him a wife, an' she's right in thar now, a listenin' to every word I say. She's a smart woman, too, I want to tell you," said he, slyly winking at his hearers.

"Wall, as to happenin's of any sort of consequence, I guess we ain't hed none. I am a thorough mossback, ye see. Hev been one for forty year, an, know but little of anything else.

"As to fortun' I hev that farm, with all thet's on it, an' thet seems to be about all I ken handle. An' for that matter, I don't know but what I hev all I really kere about. I've got ten boys an' six gals, an' ef I had a million they wouldn't be satisfied. So, when I go, thar'll be only the farm, an' thet won't be such a great thing for sixteen to fight over. Otherwise I may say thet the world has used me toler'ble well. I've never went t' bed hungry, as I ken remember, an' hev always had a good shelter for th' storm. Take it all eround, an'my story ain't very long nor does it sparkle with ther diamon's of soul stirrin' events; but I'll tell yer what ter do. We'll get down an' look over ol' Rochester an' see ef she has any marks of famil'arity an' then adjourn back t' my farm, whar I'll regale ye with hard cider, apples, doughnuts an' grandchildren. An' I'll show ye what I've done in forty years time with genuine hard muscle."—Clare in St, Louis Republic.

A REMARKABLE MAN.

His Heart Displaced and a Silver Plate In His Head.

George Burns, residing on Twenty-second street, below Federal, Philadelphia, was found in a delirious condition and was taken to the station on suspicion of being drunk. It was there discovered that he was not under the influence of liquor, but opium. Burns said he had been given a preparation containing the drug to lull the pain of a bodily malady. He surprised Dr. Judge, who was sent for, by revealing his physicial condition. He drew from his pockets a roll of newspaper clippings which indicate that he was a remarkable "freak." First of all he told the doctor and Lieutenant Scott that heart was located on the right side of his body, instead of the left, and asked them to place their hands on his chest and feel its throbbing. They did so and were astonished. He next asked them to tap on the crown of his head and when the tapping gave forth a muffled, metallic sound he informed them that a large piece of his skull had been removed by the trephine and a silver plate substituted for the missing portion,

Dr. Judge then wrote down a history of Burns' case as given by himself. He saip he said he was an engineer in the navy, and in the wreck of the Saratoga on a rock off Martha's Vineyard, in 1884, he was badly broken up. He said his skull was smashed and he was otherwise disabled by the explosion of a shell while he was engineer on the gunboat Essex at the attack on Fort Fisher during the rebellion. Altogether, he had had both legs fractured, the lower portion of the right one being broken in two places, and a compound fractures of the upper portion of the same limb; he had had three ribs on the left side removed after they were fractured, the silver plate was put in after he had suffered compression of the brain, He received a pension of $7 a week, which he had forwarded to his family in this city, while he was an inmate of a goverment home.

Too Willing To Suit.

A needy Frenchman once heard that a marriage was on the tapis between the daughter of a certain wealthy merchant and the son of a rich banker. The dowry that was to be given to the bride was 500,000 francs. The merchant was well known to be on the lookout for a good bargain or to save a dollar, so on this the Parisian founded his hopes on a good dinner at least.

He accordingly called at the merchant's residence and asked the privilege of seeing him on very important business. After a little while he was admitted to his presence.

"The matter, sir, on which I called," he began, "involves for you the practical saving of 250.000 francs. I——"

"Oh, my dear sir," interrupted the merchant, "this is too serious to be discussed before dinner, and, as it is now my hour for dining, pray take dinner with me, and we will afterward consider your proposition at our leisure."

Having partaken of a meal that left a pleasant flavor in the unfortunate's memory the rest of his life they returned to the merchant's study.

"And now I am ready to hear your proposal," he remarked.

The Parisian, after a moment's thought, began:

"I understand, sir, your daughter is to be shortly married to the son of the banker. D'Argent?"

"Yes, that is true."

"And that her dowry is half a million?"

This was also assented to.

"Well, then, here is my idea; I am ready to take her for half that sum. And thus you will save or gain exactly 250,000 francs."

Where Is Columbus' Grave ?

Where are the veritable bones of Christopher Columbus—at Cuba or St. Domingo? As every reader of history and biography knows, they were removed from the cathedral at Valladolid and sent cruising, like their venerated owner on the high seas, till they found a resting place, St. Domingo, but it is averred that the French during their temporary pocession of the latter island, transported them to Cuba. If an anecdote related by Mr. Arthur Montefiore in Temple Bar may be trusted, cute American showmen, who when they have to pay prefer the genuine article, incline to the St. Domingo relics. Not long ago, so runs the story, a speculator of this class, fortified by a recommendation from the American consul, applied to the Dominican government for permission to lease for a term of years the bones of "the great, the only Christopher." He was prepared, he intimated, to pay for a guard of eight soldiers, as well as for the services of four priests. He guaranteed, moreover, in return to remit to the Dominican government at least $20,000 per annum. He reckoned on the 60,000,000 of Americans who would come to his entertainment and be paying guests, but he reckoned without his host. The dignified reply of the president of Santo Domingo was: "Tell your countrymen that there are some objects which do not lend themselves to catch-penny schemes, and that there are people who regard such a proposal as a shameful profanation."

"August Flower"

Mrs. Sarah M. Black of Seneca, Mo., during the past two years has been affected with Neuralgia of the Head, Stomach and Womb, and writes: "My food did not seem to strengthen me at all and my appetite was very variable. My face was yellow, my head dull, and I had such pains in my left side. In the morning when I got up I would have a flow of mucus in the mouth, and a bad, bitter taste. Sometimes my breath became short, and I had such queer, tumbling, palpitating sensations around the heart. I ached all day under the shoulder blades, in the left side, and down the back of my limbs. It seemed to be worse in the wet, cold weather of Winter and Spring; and whenever the spells came on, my feet and hands would turn cold, and I could get no sleep at all. I tried everywhere, and got no relief before using August Flower Then the change came. It has done me a wonderful deal of good during the time I have taken it and is working a complete cure." ④

We have volumes of evidence to prove that S. S. S. is the only permanent cure for contagious Blood Taint.

I suffered for five years with the worst form of blood poison, during which time I was attended by the best physicians I could find, and tried numbers of proprietary medicines without any beneficial results. I continued to grow worse all this time, until my whole system was destroyed by the vile disease, my tongue and throat having great holes caused by it. I then commenced taking Swift's Specific (S.S.S.), and in a few months I was entirely cured, and to this great medicine do I attribute my recovery. This was over two years ago, and I have had no return or any effects of the disease since, and my skin is to-day as smooth as anybody's.—William Sowers, Covington, O.

SWIFT'S SPECIFIC S.S.S. is as near infallible as it is possible for a medicine to be in the cure of Blood poison.

THE SECRET

OF OUR SUCCESS.

WE CLAIM that a combination of local and constitutional treatment is necessary to thoroughly eradicate Catarrh. Exclusively local applications, if made when the trouble first begins, sometimes cure, but more frequently drive the disease to other parts of the system, where it develops in a far more serious form. Blood purifiers may improve the condition of the system, but they seldom cure—for they do not reach the seat of the disease. Certain Catarrh Cure is the only preparation which combines local and constitutional treatment, and can consistently claim to cure Catarrh in all its forms and stages. It is cheap, easily used, purely vegetable, entirely harmless. By it, others, who had no faith, have been cured: YOU CAN BE, whether you have had the disease one year or fifty; whether it is in the head, stomach or bladder. TRY IT NOW.

DELAY IS DANGEROUS.

Past Failures Need not Discourage You.

In Support of Our Claims,

We offer the testimony of those who have tried Certain Catarrh Cure to their entire satisfaction. "An ounce of experience is worth a pound of theory." Our endorsers are well known persons, who are alive and can be found. Not one of our testimonials was purchased at any price. They are the voluntary expressions of parties who seek to benefit humanity. A perusal of them will surely convince you that our claims are well founded. If you have Catarrh, you cannot afford to be indifferent to its progress. Treatment cannot be commenced too early. The longer disease continues, the more time it will require to be eradicated. Your unsatisfactory experience with other remedies should not influence you against ours. Lay aside distrust; give Certain Catarrh Cure a fair test, and you will, throughout the remainder of your life, feel thankful to us for the advice.

We have handled Certain Catarrh Cure since its first introduction. It has given general satisfaction, and such has been the increase in demand, that our purchases during the last six months have amounted to nearly twenty-five gross.—The Lamar Drug Co., Atlanta, Ga., May 1st, 1889.

$1,000 Reward--a Humbug!

DON'T BE DECEIVED by the offer of a large reward in case some medicine fails to cure you. If the reward is claimed, there is always some way to evade its payment; if never claimed, it is no evidence that everybody, or anybody, has been cured; but it speaks well for the intelligence of our people, that no one is fool enough to expect its payment. $1,000,000 might be offered with equal safety; for it is needless to say that the user of such medicines always dies before their proprietors are convinced that he "can't be cured." It is one of the most deceptive schemes that ever insulted an enlightened people.

We are disposed to give the public every protection possible against the imposition of scheming frauds or worthless nostrums, but NO DEPENDENCE CAN BE PLACED IN GUARANTEES. If Congress will pass a law by which all medicines are subjected to a thorough test, and their merits—in the diseases which they claim to cure—are fully established before they can be offered for sale, we will heartily favor it. An honest remedy suffers more from the failure of other preparations to establish their claims, than from all other causes combined—as disappointment in one medicine causes distrust in many.

Certain Catarrh Cure is mentioned so favorably, by our customers that we have great confidence in its merits.—Alexander Drug and Seed Co., Augusta, Ga.

Its Harmlessness.

Makes it entirely safe to try Certain Catarrh Cure for any trouble, without the slightest fear of injury. It is a purely vegetable preparation, and to the most delicate constitution, or organ of the body, can produce no bad effect whatever.

REMEMBER !

Certain Catarrh Cure is not simply a snuff or local application, to drive the disease from the nasal organs into the system; nor a blood remedy, to tone up the system and leave the nasal parts uncured; but it is a combination of both methods, and the only remedy which will give satisfaction in the many different stages of catarrh.

The genuine bears our Trade Mark. Take no substitute. Price, $1. Six bottles $5. Of Druggists, or by Express, prepaid, on receipt of price. Book of Information free.

THE M'FARLAND GIRLS.

IN the days of hoopskirts and side-combs there flourished in a small Indiana town a young ladies' seminary, carried on by Miss McFarland and Miss Mary Ann McFarland.

Although these guardians of maidenhood were still called "The McFarland girls," they had more than "just turned thirty" when the seminary was first started, quite ten years before the crucial period of which I am about to tell. Appearance indicated no difference in ages between Miss McFarland and Miss Mary Ann; but occasionally one of the sisters would lay down the law sufficiently to show some feeling of rightful authority owning to one year more of mortal experience.

This was Miss McFarland. The other sister would quietly give in with a pleasant "Yes, sister. Just as you say." This was Miss Mary Ann, whose only compensation for comparative youth was in the possession of smoother skin and glossier hair than "Sister." She would never confess this much even to herself. The perfect union of the two in thought and deed was one of the entertaining facts made much of at all social gatherings. However, when quietly withdrawing her will from the scene of action she would frequently smooth her fine black hair, and with a consoling sigh, glance in a convenient mirror for the effect. Dressing alike and sharing every thought had moulded the sisters so completely into one being—the principal of the McFarland seminary—that male intruders with matrimonial intentions had preforce kept their distance, doubting their own powers of attraction being sufficient to divide these "lineal descendants of the purest aristoracies." Who posed on the ragged edge of Poverty Hill with head held high in the air.

Elisha Bliss was the one male inhabitant of the quiet town brave enough to call once a week, as such frequency among the Hoosier pioneers was apt to be construed into a desire to "wait upon" the recipient of the attention. His boldness now lasted many years without interruption and issue The gentleman in question was a tall, rather limp specimen, whose greatest natural adornments were a fine head of brown hair, always carefully curled, and a soft persuasive voice.

Mr. Bliss was a member of the firm of Bliss, Banks and Co., booksellers. As he was apt to remark to the Misses McFarland, "Our occupations form a bond of union between us. You sell knowledge verbally, while I educate the ignorant by the sale of the written erudition of of the age." To which Miss McFarland or Miss Mary Ann, as the case might be, would feelingly reply: "We appreciate the situation, Mr. Bliss, and are always grateful for your companionship and advice." Miss Mary Ann had once used the word friendship in this connection before Sister, but it proved her only venture of the kind, as she was met with a severe reprimand for thus using an "endearing epithet" in relation to a single gentleman—for Elisha Bliss was single. He indulged in a bachelor of forty-five years standing never having gone through the blinding process of love, unless, as gossip insinuated he "was waiting for one of the McFarland girls, but the Lord only knows which one," owing to the regularity of his seminary calls; to which Dame Rumor replied: "He certainly does wear his sittin' breeches when he pays his respects." Saturday afternoon being always a free time with the sisters, it was set apart for receiving any chance visitors, as Sunday, in their words "belongs not to us, but to our Maker." Their inherited Scotch Presbyterianism precluded any relaxation on the Sabbath from the perscribed course of three church services relieved by cold meals prepared on Saturday, and the reading of psalms and hymns. Accordingly, one Saturday afternoon, Miss Mary Ann sat at work on her tatting at a decorous distance from the window, where she could catch a glimpse through the Venetian blinds of callers or pasers-by. As she sat, her stiff black silk with the assistance of the hoopskirt, stood quite as it were. The trim bodice and loose sleeves became well her slight figure, while her black hair brought out the quiet strength of the face no longer young. For the first time in twenty years she was prepared to receive her friends without Miss McFarland, the latter being laid up with rheumatism for the only time on reception days during all these years.

With great temerity Miss Mary Ann had consented to her sister's desire that she receive alone; and now, as her attention was called by a clicking of the latch of the front gate, the feeling of a debutante almost overpowered her. The caller proving to be Mr. Bliss, she was somewhat reassured, but her voice showed embarrassment as she responded to the familiar "Are you enjoying your usual good health, Miss Mary Ann?" by a hurried explanation of her sister's absence through indisposition. Mr. Bliss expressed his regret at Miss McFarland's illness, but did not seem particularly despondent at the prospect of an hour with Miss Mary Ann. Some talk followed about the last prayer meeting, in which Mr. Bliss had taken quite a conspicuous part; the condition of the seminary; the weather, which had been rather falling of late; and other topics of like importance. Finally a pause of uncomfortable length ensued. There seemed to be nothing left to talk about. Mr. Bliss picked up his silk hat, which had been carefully placed on the floor beside his chair, and quite as carefully smoothed it the wrong way with his finest handkerchief, drawn from the pocket of his coat tails. The tatting became refactory, and at her wits' end for something to say, Miss Mary Ann broke the pause usually filled by her sister's conversation with the question: "Mr Bliss—ah!—why, Mr. Bliss can you tell me how far it is between the mile posts?" Immediately seeing her own stupidity the poor little lady blushed most becomingly, a thing unheard of since her school-girl days.

Mr. Bliss expressed his surprise only by a cessation of the hat polishing, though he looked at her and replied in a heavily jocular way: "I had always supposed about a mile, Miss Mary Ann." This Benedict was not above the flattery of a woman's blush and generally flustered condition at finding herself alone with him. After clearing his throat with a meaning ahem! he sat very straight in his chair, and in his exhorting tone of voice, most impressive in weekly meeting, he began: "The scriptures teach us, Miss Mary Ann, that man was not made to live alone." Here he paused to note the effect of his words upon the lady opposite, who was recovering from her embarrassment under the influence of his solemn manner, then proceeded: "For some time I have thought seriously about this advice, and it has been borne in upon me that I am a black sheep in the Master's fold in my present lonely condition. For many years your admirable qualities have been before my eyes, Miss Mary Ann. My respect for them and you has grown every day, until I feel called upon to tell you of the state of my feelings, and ask you if you are willing to be my companion down the hill of life?" In the depths of the heart thus appealed to had long been hidden that inexplicable emotion without which no woman's life is fully rounded out, and this emotion had been generated by the attractions of Elisha Bliss. This was the crisis of an unselfish life. It meant protection and affection or entire renunciation for another, owing to a curious family custom which I will allow the the victim to explain. She was so long silent that Mr. Bliss was on the point of renewing the unexpected attack when she said, with a quivering smile around the patient mouth:

"I am too surprised for words, Mr. Bliss! I—I—s—supposed it was Sister!" and she had an intuitive feeling that Sister thought so too and was pleased at the idea.

"No," he replied; "Miss McFarland is a lady greatly to be admired, but I have chosen you to be my wife, provided you will consent."

But I cannot consent," she answered.

Looking blank and displeased, he asked:

"Is it because you cannot reciprocate my feelings, Miss Mary Ann?"

For a moment she hesitated, then with honest dignity explained:

"No; it is not that; but I can never marry until Sister is provided for in that way. It has been a rule in our family from time immemorial that the eldest daughter must be married before her younger sister can accept any such offers."

"But do you consider such a condition of things to be reasonable, Miss Mary Ann?" came from the discomfited suitor.

She drew herself up, and with a glance of pride at an old-fashioned portrait hanging on the wall, replied:

"My father's judgment in all things was and is supreme, Mr. Bliss. In his last moments he bade me remember the precedent of generations, to be ever constant to the interests of my elder sister." Then with a gentle sigh, and in a lower tone she continued: "If you wish to make me happy, ask Sister to be your wife."

Did ever man before listen to such a proposition, and, what is even more remarkable, accept it?

Was it pique, of resignation to the inevitable—to a Ruling Providence—which enabled him to reply. "Very well, if this is your final decision, I will speak to Miss McFarland on the subject at the first opportunity: you are my choice, but no doubt your sister will make a good wife, if she is willing." With a composed "Good after-noon,' he left Miss Mary Ann to the burial of her one hope of marital happiness.

She entered the sick-room an hour later with a bright face; related the fact that Mr. Bliss had called, and her own failure to be intertaining when left to himself. No reference was made to the rejected offer. A month later Elisha Bliss had become the prospective partner for life of Miss McFarland upon the one condition that Mary Ann was always to make her home with them. No allusion was ever made by word or action, between the participants, to the trying scene enacted behind the Venetian blinds on a certain Saturday afternoon. One night at the weekly meeting Miss Mary Ann looked up in the midst of the familiar hymn:

"Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love,
The fellowship of kindred minds surprising a reproachful glance from a pair of gray eyes, belonging to Elisha Bliss, fixed upon her persistently. This was all; and it never happened again.

In the autumn the young ladies' seminary did not reopen. Miss McFarland and Miss Mary Ann became, respectively, wife and sister-in-law to Elisha Bliss. For twenty years the three formed a harmonious domestic household. It was always "Sister and I think so and so," or "Elisha thinks with us that certain changes would be an improvement." A few years after the domestic partnership was formed, "Elisha" showed signs of weakness in the chest, which grew upon him, developing into the old-fashioned slow consumption. The sisters devided the necessary feminine attention between them, sharing sorrow and joy alike through many years of increasing pecuniary loss and hardship. Mr. and Mrs. Bliss would never listen to Mary Ann's desire to go out and make her own way in the world. "Not while I have a roof over my head," the elder sister would emphatically insist; and how they would ever have got on without her it is impossible even to imagine. Not long ago Elisha died, after coughing through nearly a quarter of a century, leaving the two old ladies to one another, as he found them, unswervingly devoted one to the other; living in the old house full of things quaint and curious though somewhat threadbare, and wearing, as of old hoopskirts and side-combs. The straight, prim figures are still unbending, but Miss Mary Ann's skin has lost its bloom, and Sister's manner of speech has grown more yielding. When they gave up the infant class in Sunday school, which was long their special charge and interest to younger hands their maternal interest found vent in making the neighborhood children happy. Among my earliest gastronomic recollections is one of fragrant little bundles sent me on every holiday with Miss Mary Ann's love, which, on being excitedly opened, proved to be ginger bread animals, or men and women with dried-currant eyes; not perfect from an anatomical standpoint, but how heavenly to the childish palate! As I matured sufficiently to comprehend their entire dovotion to each other, the thought frequently occurred to me: "What would become of either one if the other should follow Elisha alone?" Miss Mary Ann without Sister would be devoid of her stronger half, while Sister, parted from Mary Ann, would lose her noblest complement. The time has not yet come for this separation, and I trust with all my heart that they may together join Elisha.

I doubt if Miss Mary Ann has ever for a moment regretted her sacrifice, for joy of her life is in making others happy. As for Elisha Bliss, he will always remain an enigma to me, for if Sister did not suit him as well as his first choice, he was a master in the art of deception.—Anna Farquhar in Montreal Star.

Crushed.

Four or five of us entered the hotel together, but the man with the sealskin-trimmed coat pushed his way right up to the desk, registered as J. N. Powell Jones, Boston, and loudly remarked:

"Best parlor bed-room you have in the caravansary, and it must be on the front, too."

"Yes, sir," obsequiously replied the clerk, and he ran him into the elevator before he assigned any of the rest of us to a back room four floors up.

At dinner the Baron had his bottle of wine, and he had two waiters jumping at his command. When through he strolled into the office with a gold toothpick in his mouth, sat down in a prominent place, and, stretching out his legs he remarked in a loud voice: "If I had time I'd like to give the Mayor of this town a few hints on how to run it. Here, you! If the Governor calls for me say that I am out. I don't want to be bothered with him."

"Who is he?" I asked of one of the group.

"A drummer from Boston," he replied.

"Why, I thought him some great man."

"Well, you were right. They don't grow any bigger in this country."

The Baron snapped his fingers for a boy, sent for a newspaper and a cigar, and was asking if any of us had ever seen a thousand-dollar bill, when a Jew drummer for a tobacco house entered with an open telegram in his hand and handed it to the owner of the earth. It read:

"Firm of Blank & Blank, Boston, gone under for $200,000."

That was the firm the Baron traveled for. He read the dispatch twice over, gasped three or four times, and then fell on the floor. The news became public property in five minutes, and the clerk of the hotel looked coldly upon the unconscious man, and then said to the colored porter;

"Take him up the freight elevator to a cheap back room, Sam, and don't waste any more water than you can help in bringing him to. As soon as he can walk, get him out."

Superior to the English Article.

"Boy, what kind of blacking do you use?" asked a young Englishman of a bootblack. "You can get a good polish everywhere in America, you know, but I can't get it in England. My boy at home can't make my boots shine as you do."

"No," answered the boy, "England is not in it—When it comes to blacking boots. We are at the top of the heap."

"Ah! And what do you mean by, 'top of the heap?' Slang, eh?"

"Right you are. Better take me with you when you go back, give me a good salary, and I will see that your shoes always shine like that," as he gave them the finishing touches and yelled for the next "gent."

"Even the bootblacks have the money fever here," sighed the Londoner, as he sauntered away. "Great country, this. 'In it'—'top of the heap;' well, I like that. Something new, you know."

Lottery Mail Matter Seized.

CAMDEN, N. J., Jan. 21.—Postmaster Browning made his third seizure to-day of lottery mail matter addressed to residents of this city. The matter consisted of about seventy-five circulars of the Louisiana Lottery Company, stating that a drawing of the lottery would be held on the 17th day of February, and that all tickets drawing less than $1,000 would be cashed at an address in Boston, and those drawing over that amount would be cashed at New Orleans.

In accordance with the instructions he has received from Washington, Postmaster Browning forwarded the entire lot to Postmaster General Wanamaker.—N. Y. Sun, Jan. 22d.

THE NEWS.

Official Paper of the City.

Jas, Meehan, Jr. Editor and Prop.

The Thief River Falls Press man doesn't know the sentiment of the people in his "section"

It must make the farmers grit their teeth to see Farmer Geo. Ralph inspecting bridges and drawing money from the county treasury.

The East Grand Forks News is somewhat favorable to county division, the same man's paper in Fisher is adverse to allowing the subject to be voted upon by the people. We appeal from Bierley in Fisher to Bierly in East Grand Forks.

A petition with twelve hundred signers ten hundred of which are farmers, is enough to give the lie to those who claim through the columns of their papers that only "town site owners" boomers and "office seekers" are desirous of a division of the county. We have this petition upon our table at this writing. This looks very much as though "the scheme was getting a severe mauling from the press" —press us gently please.

The first original article by Count Tolstoi, that has ever been published in an American magazine, appears in the February issue of the Cosmopolitan, with a number of interesting photographich reproductions, one of them being of Tolstoi guiding a plow in his Russian fields. Brander Mathews appears with his first article upon Some Latterday Humorists. The third in the series of colored frontispieces is a delightful sketch by McVickar, illustrating a character in Mrs. Van Renssalear Cruger's new story, "Mademoiselle Reseda." Ex-Postmaster General James presents an article upon the Welsh in the United States, liberally illustrated by portraits of prominent men who are of Welsh extraction. Women Clerks in New York, by the Marquise Clara Lanza. There are also other prominent features of the February issue. Price, 25c. Cosmopolitan Pub. Co., Madison Sq., N.Y

Old "Open Wheat Market" Cooke of the Polk County Journal clips from the News of last week and then comments upon it in a schoolboy way, not only perverting the truth, but making more visible the water on his brain. The News is willing to give the farmers their dues and did not mention in its article anything discredi table to the farmers; but the old "political prostitute" is desirous of misleading and hence says "The News can see no earthly good in the alliance nor any member of it." Oh! What a great brain pent up in such narrow confines. The News regards a certain number of the farmers alliance as straightforward honest men, but when they open their ranks to soreheads and office-seekers, men without principal either moral or political, the scum of either of the old parties we have no use for the alliance and have no particular desire to twallows it whole or in part. Senator Lommen represents Crookston and not the balance of Polk county and no doubt sent the circular letters to many whom he knew would answer adversely to a division of the county. Senator Lommen should feel grateful to the Polk County Journal for its support, knowing he is a second handed candidate and that the Journal hoisted him after he had endeavored to bleed the other nominees. Cook is "built that way."

Senator Donnelly's attack upon Senator Washburn shows very bad grace, in so far as to hit the Senior Senator when his back is turned. It is doubtful if there is an official in Minnesota or from this state who stands nearer the common people as well as all other classes, than does Senator Washburn. By his vote upon the infamos force bill he has shown his independence—he is a man ever true to his friends and unrelenting in his efforts to punish his enemies. It was a Washburn who branded Donnelly a traitor to his nationality and religion.—These words of truth no doubt are ringing in the ears of the sage and haunt him in his sleep. For speaking the truth he dares attack Senator Washburn on the floor of the state senate and endeavor to malign the character of the best working representative the state has at the national capiatl.

The memory of Washburn will long remain honored by the people while Donnelly's will be known as a political demagogue—a professional office seeker whose good deeds are outnumbered by his bad ones. Passing as a representative of the people he is ever ready and willing to sell their interests for political influence. This is not statesmanship. It is such trickery that consigns able talent to the port of condemnation. Some of the people may be fooled some of the time but a majority will not listen to Donnelly's personal attacks without resenting the slander he endeavors to heap upon Minnesota's ablest representative.

VANDERBILT RICHES.

MADE UP OF A VAST AGGREGATION OF STOCKS AND BONDS.

How the Elder W. H. Vanderbilt's Wealth Was Divided Between His Sons—To What Extent the Latter Have Increased Their Inheritance—The Family.

William H. Vanderbilt was by long odds the wealthiest man in the world. The lowest estimate put upon his fortune was $160,000,000. Chauncey M. Depew said it aggregated $200,000,000, and that figure was probably not far wrong. To each of his eight children was bequeathed $10,000,000; $5,000,000 was set aside to provide an income for Mrs. Vanderbilt, and the remainder was directed to be divided between the two eldest sons, Cornelius and William K. Vanderbilt.

In round numbers they received $55,500,000 each, which, with the bequests of $10,000,000, increased their shares to $65,500,000. Cornelius Vanderbilt at the time was estimated to possess $5,000,000. The present estimates of their fortunes take into consideration the natural accumulations and allow for the expenditures, for it is known that the Vanderbilts use a great deal of money.

W. H. VANDERBILT.

The accumulation of money by Commodore Vanderbilt was more notable than that by Mr. Gould, or perhaps by any other man who made himself a multi-millionaire through his own efforts. It was more difficult to make money in the days of Commodore Vanderbilt than it is now, yet the commodore in his lifetime amassed a fortune of fully $80,000,000. This amount was more than doubled by William H. Vanderbilt principally through the extension of his railway interests.

Next to the Astor fortune there is no fortune so securely invested as that of the Vanderbilts. It consists almost entirely of government bonds and the securities of the Vanderbilt railroads, which form one of the most prosperous systems in the country. The Vanderbilt stocks suffer less in the mutations of the stock market than almost any other class of securities, and the Vanderbilt fortunes accordingly sustain small changes in periods of financial stress.

At one time William H. Vanderbilt was an operator in the stock market on a great scale. Both he and his two eldest sons, Cornelius and William K., lost heavily in the tumultuous financial times of 1884 and then abandoned speculation altogether. Cornelius and William K. Vanderbilt are said to have lately increased their holdings of stocks to a considerable extent, not, however, for speculation, but for investment. The interests and dividends which they receive amount up very fast, and they diminish the accumulation every now and then by buying stocks and bonds. For the most part they purchase the securities of their own roads, although they have bought a good many government bonds.

CORNELIUS VANDERBILT.

Cornelius Vanderbilt was the favorite of his grandfather, the commodore, whose name he bears. He is an excellent business man, of conservative ways. When not absent from New York he is to be found every day at his office in the Grand Central station. A door from his office opens into the office of Chauncey M. Depew, the president of the New York Central and Hudson River railroad. He depends on Mr. Depew for counsel, as his father did before him, and takes infinite pleasure in Mr. Depew's clever sayings and funny stories. He and Mr. Depew lunch together regularly.

Mr. Vanderbilt is interested perhaps more in church work than in financial affairs. He erected a very handsome building for the railroad branch of the Young Men's Christian association and often takes part in its meetings. He is never heard as a speaker except at these meetings. He attends the fashionable St. Bartholomew's church in Madison avenue, and may be seen any Sunday afternoon wending his way home from service with a prayer book and hymnal in his hand. He has never displayed any political aspirations. His name was once suggested for mayor, but the proposition met with prompt disapproval.

Aware that he has more money than he can spend even by the most lavish outlay, William K. Vanderbilt leads perhaps the most elegant life of any American. He pays little attention to business for the good reason that there is little necessity for it. As his property is made up of the securities of the railroads which his brother Cornelius oversees with zealous care, it is in no danger of impairment. He and his wife are devoted to the pleasures of society. His steam yacht, the Alva, named after his wife, is the finest private craft afloat, and he spends much of his time on it. He has the reputation at the Union club, of which he is a member, of being one of the most expert whist players in New York.

THE VANDERBILT SONS.

Fred W. Vanderbilt, who occupies the old mansion of William H. Vanderbilt at Fifth avenue and Fortieth street, was formerly one of the most successful speculators in Wall street, but he stopped stock operations at the request of his father when the latter discontinued his own ventures in the financial whirl. Like William H. Vanderbilt, he is a lover of speedy horses, and his stable contains some of the best roadsters that show their quality on St. Nicholas avenue. A favorite diversion of his is billiards. Few professionals can handle the cue with more adroitness.

William H. Vanderbilt's youngest son, George W. Vanderbilt, never displays any leaning toward finance. He is a thorough bookworm, and has a library of which there are few equals. A few years ago he was animated with an ambition to become a newspaper reporter, but was finally dissuaded by his family from entering journalism. He was willing to begin at the bottom and work up. He expected in time of course to be a "great editor." He has turned from stocks to lands in his investments. He is one of the large landholders on Staten Island, and has a great tract in the south.

William H. Vanderbilt built a house for each of his children, with the exception of Fred W., to whom, as stated, he gave his own former residence, and of George W., the only unmarried one, who resides with his mother in the great brown stone structure on Fifth avenue and Fifty-first street. —New York World.

Too Big for Half Rates.

Truth is eminently stranger than fiction. A big, long, lank male human entered the Delaware and Hudson railroad depot and went up to the ticket office. He folded himself up until his chin came on a level with the window, and asked in a small voice for a half fare ticket.

"Stand up," said the ticket agent.

"I can't," piped the six footer, "unless you get me a stool to stand on."

But it didn't work. The ticket agent blocked his little game and he had to pay full fare.—Albany Argus.

AN IDEAL CHRISTIAN.

Doctrines of the Bible Practiced to the Letter by a Texas Physician.

"I have been looking all my life for an ideal Christian," said a young minister who was on a visit to Houston a few days since, "and I am quite sure that I have found one at last. They are not too plentiful, you may be sure. There is always plenty of religion to be found in people about camp meeting times, but the kind that lasts the whole year round, that is sweet and unpretending in manner, and that is just as full of works as it is faith—why, you don't find that every day, you know.

"I had to go to a distant city to have my throat treated by a noted specialist. Now, of course, a preacher on a country circuit has to look at a dollar a good many times before he expends it, and the truth is that I could not well afford the expense of such a trip, much less of the treatment; but I could not neglect my throat. I wrote the doctor and made an appointment with him, and at the appointed time I went. And this doctor, a wealthy and successful man, is the ideal Christian I have found—the man who has given me new and broader views of life and of all its possibilities.

"He met me at the depot with his carriage and took me to his magnificent home. I would have felt very ill at ease amid so much splendor, for my life has led me along a very different path as you know, but the man himself was so quiet, so earnest and unassuming that I forgot about his house and thought only of him. The place was filled with an atmosphere of true unostentatious religion. You drew it in with every breath. It was so evidently part of the daily life that there was no questioning it or wondering about it even.

"I was under treatment the next day, and did not leave the house. The doctor came from his office at 4 o'clock, but went away again at once, and was gone until dark. He didn't speak of his absence, and I did not question him, but the next day I found out all about it. He invited me to go with him the next evening, and we drove out to one of the poorest and most squalid suburbs. He stopped before a wretched little cabin, and the ragged children in the yard knew him and ran to meet him. We went into the house and sat down, and he took out his Bible. My heart sank for a moment, as I wondered if he were going to feed the poor on tracts alone. But no! After he had read some comforting little passage and had talked with the people a few moments we arose, and he slipped money in the mother's hand. We went from house to house the whole evening, and everywhere it was the same thing—the comforting passage, the earnest prayer, the stealthy gift.

"And this man has done this every day during his two years' residence in that city. Think of that work going on every day! And he holds cottage prayer meetings twice a week, and some of the hardest men in that city have been converted at those prayer meetings. He is building a mission church, building it with his own money, in some of those wretched outskirts, and is going to see that the poor have the gospel preached unto them. As for his treatment of me I cannot speak of it without tears, you see. When we came to settle he not only refused a fee, but insisted on paying my expenses there and back."—Troy Standard.

Elegy Mongers.

One of the items of expenditure which became fashionable after the Restoration was the payment of rhymsters to write funeral elegies. Quite a host of poetasters traded on this fashion, and the specimens which Mr. Maidment collected of their effusions show that the majority would have been dear at any price. Neither in veracity nor in literary quality do these Scottish elegaic writers seem to have been better than he who wrote the famous epitaph of the lady who was "bland, passionate and deeply religious; she painted in water colors, and sent several pictures to the Dublin exhibition; she was first cousin to Lady Jones, and of such is the kingdom of heaven"—an epitaph which is even exceeded by an obituary notice of a Miss Wallace. Of this lady it was recorded that "Her conduct was beyond all praise. She engaged in ornamental working on glass, confided greatly in others, and died in squalid penury." As for the funeral poets, a casual perusal of Mr. Maidment's collection leaves the impression that if, as he says, the poetaster was a person as necessary as the undertaker, one would rather remain unburied than be so atrociously sung.—Scottish Review.

Good and Bad Effects of Sea Air.

The conversation in a little gathering up town on a recent evening passed to the effect of sea air on various things, including, of course, tobacco. One man told the rather curious fact that ale is often sent from England on a sea voyage to India and back, and its flavor much improved thereby. Another man remarked:

"A person who has always lived in this country doesn't know what good tea really is. No matter how tightly boxes of tea are closed before being shipped here from China, the sea air always manages to get at the leaf and causes its flavor to deteriorate materially. Any one who has drunk tea in Russia which has been transported overland appreciates the damage done by the sea air. In England, also, tea that comes from China over Europe and has to undergo only a brief sea voyage is prized much more highly than that which makes the entire journey in a ship."—New York Tribune.

A Philosopher at the Billiard Table.

One day Mr. Herbert Spencer sauntered into the billiard room at the Senior, and invited a nice young major, who was the only person there, to take a cue. The major did so. Beginning to play with deliberation the great philosopher gave a miss in balk. His opponent caromed off the red, and left off at thirty-seven with all the balls out of play. Mr. Spencer made another miss. Then the major ran out.

"Sir," the philosopher said as he gravely put his cue into its case, "a certain dexterity in games of skill indicates a well balanced mind, but expertness such as you have displayed is strong presumptive evidence of an ill spent youth. I wish you good afternoon!"—Rod and Gun.

Hot Water Cure for Neuralgia.

A towel folded several times and dipped in hot water and quickly wrung, and applied over the toothache or neuralgia will generally afford prompt relief. This treatment in colic works like magic. There is nothing that so promptly cuts short a congestion of the lungs, sore throat or rheumatism as hot water, when applied promptly and thoroughly.—Exchange.

A Kerosene Spider Trap.

A correspondent points out that kerosene has the power of attracting and destroying spiders. A cup placed under the tip of a kerosene reservoir to collect the drops was found to draw the insects by its odor and quickly destroy them.

Now, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of said power, said mortgage will be foreclosed and said premises will be sold at public auction by the sheriff of said county or his deputy on the 21st day of February 1891, at 10 o'clock a. m. at the front door of the court house in the city of Crookston in said county, to pay said debt and interest and taxes and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees and disbursements allowed by law.

Notice of Mortgage Foreclosure.

Default has been made in the conditions of a certain mortgage, and in the payment of the debt secured thereby, which said mortgage bears date July 31st 1882, and on said date was duly executed and delivered by Samuel Meunir, mortgagor, to the Colonial and United States Mortgage Co., (Limited) mortgagee, a corporation duly organized, and authorized to transact business in Minnesota, and which said mortgage was duly recorded in the office of register of deeds in and for the county of Polk, Minnesota, on the 31st day of July, A. D. 1882 at 4:45 o'clock p. m. in book "G" of mortgages, on pages 508, 509 and 510. That thereafter, to-wit: On the 16th day of August, 1887, said mortgagee, for value received, sold and duly assigned said mortgage to Albert W. Knaak, by an instrument in writing duly executed and delivered on said date, which said assignment was duly recorded in the register of deeds office in said Polk county, Minnesota, on the 5th day of September, 1887, at 11 o'clock a.m., in book 32 of mortgages, on page 410.

And whereas, there is now claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon said mortgage and the debt secured thereby, the amount of four hundred and seventy-six dollars, together with the additional amount of seventy-two dollars, paid by said asignee for taxes on the premises described in said mortgage, and interest on the taxes so paid, which amount is also claimed as a lien on said premises and secured by said mortgage and no action or proceeding at law or otherwise has been had or instituted to recover the debts secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale in said mortgage contained, and therewith recorded, which by reason of the default above mentioned, has become operative, and of the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the land and premises described in and covered by said mortgage, to-wit:

The fractional north-west quarter (¼) of section number three (3), being the south half of said northwest quarter (nw¼) and lots numbered three (three) and four (4), government subdivisions of said section three, (3) in township number one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range number forty-two (42) west, containing one hundred and fifty nine 16-100 acres, and situated in the county of Polk and state of Minnesota, will be sold at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage and debt secured thereby, taxes and interest, together with all foreclosure expenses and lawful disbursements including twenty-five dollars attorney's fees, stipulated to be paid in said mortgage in case of foreclosure thereof, which sale will be made by the sheriff of Polk county or his deputy, at the front door of the First National bank in the village of Red Lake Falls in said county of Polk, Minnesota, on Saturday, the 14th day of March, 1891, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon of that day.

Dated Dec. 5th, 1890.

Fred Zeh went to Thief River Falls Saturday.

Jas. Meehan Sr. drove down from Red Lake last week.

There was a dance at the section house Saturday night.

Mr. and Mrs. E. P. Duffy were over from Buffington to the wedding ball,

A large number of people were over from Lambert, Terrebonne and Gentilly to the wedding.

Kretzschmars hall may now be pronounced danger-proof. It withstood an immense strain Tuesday night.

H. L. Dougherty of Briton, Dah., returned home Saturday, having visited here several days and surveyed the field.

Fred Owen drove to Thief River Falls and renurned Monday. He represents the Chapin-Wells hardware company of Duluth.

J.Z. Perron returned last Thursday from his trip to Wisconsin. The machinery for the Red Lake steamer was soon to follow.

John Duffy received intelligence as to his mother's condition. She is out of danger, and may eventually return with Miss Mollie for a visit.

Frank Tessier is at his old post again, mixing tempting beverages in Fred Borcher's refreshment parlors. Frank reports a pleasant trip.

Those papers that talk about townsite boomers—if they looked into their own hearts they would find the cause of these statements an ambition they themselves are thus condemning.

Now it is a groundhog case—we are to have six weeks cold weather, dating from Tuesday. The groundhog saw his shadow on candlemas day and has again returned to peaceful dreams of grub worms and rattle-snakes soup—when spring shall have opened.

The North Side Roller Mill has shut down for want of wheat to grind. They offer free storage till May to all farmers who wish to hold their wheat. All wheat is insured the moment it goes into the elevator. Farmers, bring in your wheat. J. D. MARSHALL, Manager.

It is very obvious that those towns opposing county division do so from merely selfish motives. It would be a relief if they came out openly and admitted this. However, they content themselves with transparent statements that any school boy could dissolve.

A. D. Wi[illegible], our land agent, made a business trip to Fargo Saturday.

Cash paid for barley, oats, flax' hides pelts. All kinds of coal for sale—at Hoskins & Co.'s elevator.

Wm Ralph and Bob Bourdon are rusticating in the forests of Beltrami Co., where tne tall pine, as if aspiring heavenward, stretch out their majestic branches, each spray of which becomes a harp and catching up the flitting zephyrs, etc.

The post office has this week been one year under the present management. Miss Ralph has had almost entire charge, and added to the capable business management of the office, which could not be better, the irresistible post mistress has engrafted herself in the esteem and good graces of the entire community.

Louis La Bissoniere, the young gentleman who has for two years been a familiar figure as clerk in Schreiter's mercantile establishment, has resigned his position preparatory to leaving for California. Now, we don't like to see Louie leave, or go so far, but wish him abundant sucess in his new home, however. He starts Thursday next.

It might interest many of our readers and especially local readers to know that it has been a very cold week. The Italian weather continued up to Friday evening, Jan. 29, when winter set in. Now it doesn't seem to be any trick at all for the thermometer to go dancing among the twenties and thirties. It however getting warmer—or less cold, if you like.

N. P. Lund returned from Duluth Monday. He had been there looking around previous to moving his family there. Mr. Lund will now remain here, having come to this conclusion during his absence. He heard so much about Red Lake Falls and her prospects for next summer that he returns, brimful of enthusiasm, and predicts the usual summer boom.

Mat Oxborough, the bonanza farmer of Black River, sold a section of land to the Schmitz brothers last week for $5,000. Mr. Oxborough has left with his family for Milwaukee. The Schmitz brothers will next summer make innumerable improvements upon the place, and doubtless establish a paying farm. Land is changing hands quite frequently in this vicinity this winter and prices are advancing steadily.

Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Holtzknecht were agreeably surprised last Thursday night by their friends bent on having an evening's enjoyment. Not a word had previously reached their ears, and it is safe to say they thought the Chippewas had broken out in dead earnest till the merry familiar faces came in view. A jolly time was spent, however, and the genial host and hostess displayed their brilliant qualities as entertainers to the satisfaction of all. Delicious refreshments were partaken of in due time, the invaders having provided a goodly quantity.

Herman Kreil, who is employed as bran and shorts packer at North Side Roller Mills, lost one of his fingers Saturday afternoon. He was sweeping, and accidently thrust his hand against the machinery. Quick as a flash the third finger of his right hand was caught in a cog-wheel and almost wrenched intwo below the first joint. It was still attached by a slender cord, and Dr. Watson, who attended the unfortunate fellow, completed the amputation. Herman will be disabled for some time, and piano playing will be seriously interfered with.

Crookston is to shortly lose another of its good citizens. Mr. E. W. Wile has disposed if his intrest in the C. O. D. clothing house and is preparing to move to LaPort, Ind., where he will join his father in the banking and real estate business. We understand Harry Falk who has been with the firm of Rosenthal & Wile since they started in business here, has purchased Mr. Wile's interest and will become a member of the firm. Crookston will suffer a heavy loss when Mr. and Mrs. Wile take their departure. They haye always been active in every good work and there are none but will sincerely regret to see them leave us.—Crookston Times.

An organization of Red River Valley farmers, to be known as the Northwestern Protective association was perfected at Grand Forks, Friday. The ultimate object of the association is to ship grain direct to Liverpool. A committee had previously been sent to Duluth to look into all matters concerning the reception of of wheat there, etc. They made a report of some length and recommended the appointment of an agent to look after the interests of the association at Duluth during the shipping season and expressed regret that the matter had not been investigated by the farmers before. The society was formerly known as "Scandinavian Farmers' Anti-Monopoly Association. The present membership is but a hundred. A large enrollment, of thousands, is expected. An elevator will be built at Duluth, and next year's crop shipped diret to Liverpool.

MAJERES—CROMPE—At St. Antoine's church, Terrebonne, Tuesday, Feb. 3d, by Rev. Louis Feige, Mr. N. Majeres, of this city, to Miss Tillie Crompe, of Terrebonne.

The ceremony being performed a little after ten a. m., in the presence of a large number of friends, the bridal party repaired to the home of the bride's parents and were soon seated ton elegant wedding dinner. The afternoon was spent there, but in the evening the bride and groom, together with a large number of invited guests drove to town preparatory to enjoying a ball at Kretzschmar hall. The evening was desperately cold, but this did not prevent the presence at the ball of one of the largest gatherings ever held there. About three hundred guests were present. It was a merry scene, all life and gaiety, just suitable to such an occasion, and the gayest among the gay were the bride and groom, who could easily have been set down as such by many traits, as the intensity of thiir hilarity, the large proportion of their smiles a peculiar dignified and elevated look, and at times a very wise and knowing expression that seemed to bespeak an appreciation of the importance of the event. The notes of the musicians were at times almost drowned by the garbled jest and laughter that went merrily on, amid the sparkle and enthusiasm of the dance. Flitting here and there through the merry throng like a butterfiy basking in the sunshine of happiness, was the beautiful bride, bestowing benediction on all sides. The festivities did not cease till daylight was threatened. Many were the guests who had come full twenty miles to participate in the grand event, and well they were repaid.

Mr. and Mrs. Majeres are too well known to need any introduction here; suffice it to say that they have the esteem and good wishes of an army of friends, among whom the NEWS is proud to be numbered.

The Division Topic.

Ws publish on the on the front page the area of each county in Minnesota. We especially ask our readers to look at it and note the size of the counties. The average area of the counties of Minnesota, outside of Beltrami, Lake and Itasca, which are unorganized, is a little over eight hundred miles. If Polk were divided into four counties each would present nearly that area, and be thus up to the average. Then, if this county were divided, it wonld lower the average area of the counties in the state. It is therefore to be noted that when the opposing press speaks of "cutting the county up into small slices," they use a rediculous and distorted simile; they do, in fact, endeavor to pervert the truth to their own benefit. This kind of procedure does not profit in the end. An intelligent body of people want to be addressed in at least a sensible and truthful manner; it offends self-esteem to be put aside as a set of unthinkiag, unlogical citizens. This is the treatment the Crookston papers accord their readers. There is no denying the fact that a county with an are of 800 square miles is not a small slice of territory. Over five-eights of the counties of Minnesota have an area less than each of the proposed new counties would have. and some have less than half the area. If this, then, is the case, any sane person may see at a glance that the proposed division into four counties is not anything within the shadow of unreasonableness; on the other hand, any unbiased person would not delay admitting that it is a vesy reasonable and just demand.

The statement that taxes would be raised is another blind howl echoed heedlessly. It takes but slight reflection to confirm the veriest sluggard that, for those who reside any considerable distance from the county seat, even if taxes were raised, (which they would not be, after the first year or so) division would prove a financial boon. No argument is necessary to convince such people that they can and would save many times over any increased taxes, in having a county seat within a reasonable distance. There are many reasons why taxes would naturally not be so high. We claim, with sound reason as a second, that taxes would be lower. The expense of running the present county is far, very far, in excess of those of a small county, and the distances traveled by sheriffs, constables, commissioners and committee men makes alone a huge item to be set down in favor of small counties. A glance at the salaries of our county officers, and especially the clerk hire, the latter being a direct consequence of too large a territory and too bulky a business, will show that with an economic adjustment, they might be easily sufficient for salaries of four set of county officers. So give us no more excrescences on this score. Let us hear no more puerile statements about "fat offices for the boys," etc.,—another favorite howl from those who find none better. In fact, the only one sound point in this clamor of higher taxes is the expense incident upon new county buildings. But inasmuch as this expense will be shouldered by the respective county seats, this, last argument also falls flat. In conclusion we would say unbiased tax-payers readily perceive all this, but it is useless to attempt to make an obstinate mule drink even though he be famishing, or convince those deaf to conviction.

RED LAKE FALLS, MINN.

To Our Patrons,---We take this opportunity of expressing our thanks for past patronage and asking for a continuance of the same during the ensuing year.

We shall strive to anticipate the wants of our customers by keeping a fully assorted stock of staple and fancy groceries, dry goods, clothing, hats and caps, boots and shoes, etc. These we do not claim to sell at, or below cost, but at a very moderate margin of profit, and, as we shall buy and sell for cash (or [illegible] ange) only, we feel sure that our prices will average low.

We shall aim at all times to allow the highest market price for wool, hides, fur, butter, eggs and snake root and will exchange our goods therefor at cash prices.

To those who prefer to buy their groceries in large quantities for cash we will make extra close prices. Do not send your money out of the county until you know what your home dealers will do. If they will do as well as strangers why should you, by your trade, build up distant towns at the expense o your own?

We will make large reductions from regular prices on our winter goods, such as overcoats, ladie's and childrens' cloaks, blankets, warm footwear, etc. If you are needing any of these goods get our prices before you buy elsewhere.

We would call your attention to our large supply of fish for the Lenten season. As usual we have a full variety and prices are very low.

Wishing you a prosperous year,

We Are Yours Truly,

Mary Ligvier, a 13 year old girl from Crookston, accompanied by William Seward Debarge, a youth of above 18, of the same city, arrived at Grand Forks Saturday and, after vainly trying to get a marriage licence left ostenisbly for Duluth. The girl's father accompanied the pair and seemed anxious to have the marriage performed, but the county judge would not issue a license without the consent of the parents of both parties. Tuesday morning a warrant reached the chief of police from Crookston for the arrest of the prospective bridegroom on the charge of larceny and embezzlement preferred by his mother. It seems that Debarge forged his mother's name, and after drawing her entire savings from the bank and stealing a gold watch, decamped with the girl. The couple have not yet been found.

Negro Melodies.

Never have anything classical about them, not suited to the fastidous ear of the professional musician, there is yet something undefinable in the socalled "plantation" melodies which charms the heart of the great mass of common humanity the world over. The immense success of the two or three troupes of genuine "Jubilee Singers" that have made triumphal progresses through this country and Europe, attest the hold their songs have on humanity. The old plantation marrymakings have passed away with slavery will have an opportunity to hear something of the real sort. Beside, the Southern states are delightful for a winter tour. The magnificent service of "The Burlingtn," reaching both Chicago and St. Louis over its own tracks, without change of cars, makes it the favorite of travelers bound south. Information as to rates, rontes, etc, will be cheerfully furnished by agents, or can be had by writing to W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass Agent, C. B. & N.R. R., St. Paul, Minn.

GOV. ABBETT says that the value of land per acre is greater in New Jersey than in any other state in the union. THE severity of winter in England and throughout Europe is greater than has been known in many years. For several seasons winters this side the Atlantic have been proportionally milder than in Europe. Even the present winter, though colder than the two or three last past, is not so severe as winters used to be twenty to thirty years ago, especially in the Northwest.

THE New York Christian Advocate says Robert J. A TRICK of the alleged mind reader, J. Randall Brown, was exposed at Davenport. He undertook to tell a gentleman the number of his watch, and as a beginning told the owner of the watch to write on a slip of paper handed him on a black book the number. Just before the feat was performed it was learned that the "blank book" used as a writing pad was composed of impression paper, and by the writing of the number on it a copy had been left for information of the "mind reader."

The president sent to the senate a letter from Secretary Noble recommending favorable consideration of the bill appropriating $187,039 to compensate the Crow Creek Indians of South Dakota for loss sustained by them in receiving less land per capital in their diminished reservation than is received by Indians occupying other diminished reservations under the act of March 2, 1889.

Rev. J. Settee, missionary among the Indian tribes around Lake Winnipeg and Manitoba, writes that camps of Indians hunting on the east side of Lake Winnipeg, not very far from Blood Vein river, near Dog Head, were visited by a band of wolves, about 100 in number. They attacked the camps and killed many Indains and devoured them. One Indian cudgeled and killed twenty wolves, another Indian climbed up a tree with his gun and shot down twenty. One got upon a stage which was not very high and the wolves got him down and devoured him. There is a great panic among the Indians in that quarter. The Indians say that there are no deer, consequently the wolves are mad with hunger.

The shooting of Mrs. W. J. Faulk by her husband in Pittsburg in a fit of religious enthusiasm has resulted in a warrant being issued for one George Knauff as an accessory before the fact. Faulk declares his religious insanity was inspired by the hypnotic influence of Knauff, who claimed to be another Messiah, and ordered him to kill his wife. This Faulk did, and officers are now hunting Knauff, who has disappeared.

A desperate attempt at jail delivery occurred at Cleveland, Ohio. When Sheriff Duff unlocked the door of a cage he was seized by two of the eight men confined therein, and a pistol taken from him. A lamp was knocked out of his hand and a desperate fight ensued, one man against eight. The plucky officer drew another pistol and firing began. The prisoner who had Duff's pistol put it full in the officer's face and fired it but the bullet missed its mark although the sheriff was badly powder-burned. Duff wrenched the weapon away and was master of the situation and locked up the unruly inmates of the cell. Scores of citizens armed with guns and pistols flocked to the jail, but their aid was not needed.

Terrific snow storms have prevailed recently through the southeastern portion of Russia. Deep drifts have been formed in many localities, and as a result whole villages and numbers of isolated houses have been almost buried in snow. The railroad tracks are entirely useless from the piles of snow resting upon them, and the only means of communication between the villages and towns is by sleighs. Added to the inconvenience to which the inhabitants are subjected are the sufferings which they are forced to endure on account of the bitterly cold wheather experienced in the snowed up districts. Numbers of people are already known to have been frozen to death, and it is feared that, as the snow disappears, there will be further loss of life revealed.

The rival houses are to meet as one body, the Republicans getting twenty-eight members and Democrats twenty-seven. The Democrats are also to have the speaker, the subordinate officers and control of the committees. The compromise was drawn up by the senators of both parties and will be signed.

A Nobleman Seeks Death.

A thrilling story comes from Naples to the effect that a wealthy scion of a noble Italian family has made a desperate attempt to commit suicide in consequence, it is supposed, of a love affair. The names of the parties are carefully concealed; but it is believed that the beautiful widow of a recently deceased prince was the cause of the rash act. It seems that the passengers on the steamship Gottard, while on a voyage from Leghorn to Naples, became rather interested in the behavior of one of their number.

The individual in question is described as handsome and of commanding physique, but morose in temperament and haughty in demeanor. He resented all attempts at conversation, and evidently considered himself as far removed socially from the rest of his fellow voyagers. One night, when within a few hours' steaming of Naples, the watch was startled by the cry of "a man overboard!" Capt. Dilberto, the commander of the vessel, rushed on deck and ordered a boat to be lowered. One of the quarter life boats, with five men in her, went to the rescue, and in the bright moonlight saw a dark object rise to the surface.

Approaching the spot they seized the drowning man, who turned out to be the mysterious passenger. Instead of being grateful for his rescue he fought the boat's crew desperately, drawing a knife from his girdle and wounding two of them. He was overpowered and taken on board and locked in a state room, but eluding his guards, rushed out on deck and snatching a heavy crowbar dared any one to stop him. He made a rush toward the ship's bulwarks with the evident intention of again jumping overboard. Two or three courageous sailors, however, threw themselves upon him and flung him down. He was then heavily ironed and strictly watched until port was reached, when he was handed over to the authorities.

On his person was found upward of 2,000 francs in gold and several love letters with the name carefully erased. When interrogated he refused to give any name or to answer any questions. The story has created extraordinary interest in social circles in both Rome and Naples.

Fairy Tales.

London Queen: The charm of fairy tales survives the age for which they are written. Setting aside the scientific explanation of certain facts—such as the concealment of the name in stories of the Rumpelstiltzkin class; proving this to be a mere survival of the old savage superstition which forbids a wife to utter her husband's name; which, indeed, hides the true name as part of the self that sorcery could hurt all the same as it could hurt the person by means of the hair, nails, etc.—setting aside, too, the still more recondite explanations which would lift these stories out of the region of fancy and affiliate them to the graver parentage of sun-myths and the like—the delight of the mere thing itself is as great as it was when we were children, and more than half believed such things had been if even they were not then. Fairy tales have every requisite that goes to make a good story. Simple in outline, they are vivid in description. Full of adventure, they are neither prolix nor disappointing. They have no wearisome introspection, no exhausting analysis of character or motives. The bad are as black as night, and have not so much as a glow-worm's amount of light to redeem them. The good are without flaw, and end in a blaze of glory, like a Covent Garden transformation scene. All the lovely princesses and charming young princes are made after the same pattern, with not even so much difference among them as there is in a row of wax dolls in a toy shop. They all have the same fault—curiosity and disobedience—and are sure to do the very thing they are told not to do, with the sweetest unconsciousness, the supremest indifference to their promise, and the most artistic forgetfulness of threatened consequences. They never have the moral stature of full-grown human beings, and one never imagines them of the same height. They are mannikins—dolls to suit the grasp and comprehension of the little people to whom they are addressed; and the verities of human nature are sent out into the desert, together with the possibilities of human life. A nursery without fairy books is as doleful a place as one without a furry rabbit to rub up mother's arm when she takes it into her hand, or a cohort of dolls to share the joys, to lessen the griefs and receive the secrets of the various little curly wigs who are their owners.

CAUSED HER DEATH.

Fatal Termination of the Injuries Received by a Young Lady School Teacher.

Her Assailants the Enraged Parents of the Pupil Whom She Had Punished.

WINNEBAGO CITY, Minn., Feb. 3.—News has been received here of the death from her injuries of Miss Lent, the young school teacher who was brutally assaulted by the Cruzer family a few days since. Miss Lent was teaching a country school near this place and punished a daughter of the Cruzens. Her parents were informed by another daughter, and, wild with rage, they went to the school house and assaulted the teacher. Mrs. Cruzen hit her with the school bell, knocking her down.

Miss Lent's hair was hanging over her shoulder, and the enraged woman grabbed it, dragging the helpless girl around the room until the cap of the skull was partly torn from its place. Her husband then came to her aid, and together they raised Miss Lent's prostrate form and threw her out of the window, her head striking on a stone. The panic-stricken pupils scattered to their homes and gave the information of the assault. Miss Lent's injuries were so severe that she was compelled to take to her bed, from which she never afterward arose.

Great indignation prevailed and the Cruzen's, father, mother and daughter, were arrested at once, but they are now out on bail. To-morrow is the day set for their examination on the charge of assault.

Miss Lent was the daughter of Frank Lent, an old and respected farmer of Faribault county.

FOUND IN A POOL OF BLOOD.

Bold Attempt to Murder a Young Lady in New York State.

UTICA, N. Y., Feb. 3.—Last night Lena Marks, aged twenty, the daughter of a baker living in Marcy, twenty-five miles from this city, left the house to go to the bakery. After a time the family became alarmed at her absence and went to the bakery to find her. She was found lying in a pool of blood just outside the bakery door, with her throat cut from one side to the other. After hours of work the girl became conscious, and it is now believed she will recover. The doctor who attended the girl thinks that she was first assaulted and then that her assailant attempted to murder her to escape detection from the crime of outrage.

She says she had been in the bakery but a few minutes when the door opened and a stranger stepped into the room. He asked her to follow him, and on her refusal he turned toward her with a bottle and handkerchief in his hands, and after a moment's struggle the girl lost consciousness and was in his power. She is aware who her assailant is, and, though she does not know his name, it is probable that from her description of him, that he may be captured.

LAID TO THE MAFIA.

The Chicago Police Think That Society Caused Siennas' Murder.

CHICAGO, Feb. 3.—The stilletto murder grows daily more sensational. To-day Police Inspector Punt, after careful investigation reached the conclusion that the victim was decoyed into the woods at Parkside by the tale that stolen property was buried there and could be purchased at a low figure. Arriving at a previously selected spot Sennas was told to dig at the foot of a scrub oak tree for the plant. While on his knees digging, Vallone struck him a fearful blow in the neck with the stiletto.

The dead man sent large, closely sealed packages at regular intervals to Italy, and this circumstance, together with the peculiar facts of the assassination, is taken as tending to confirm a suspicion that the tragedy was the work of the Mafia.

REFUSED AN INJUNCTION.

No Restraint on the Sale of the Encyclopedia Britannica.

NEW YORK, Feb. 3.—Judge Wallis, in the United States circuit court rendered a decision to-day refusing to grant an injuction against the firm of Ehrich Bros. to restrain them from selling the "Encyclopedia Britanica" published by R. S. Peal & Co. of Chicago.

The complainants are the firm of Black & Co., publishers of the original work at Edinburgh, Scotland. In his decision Judge Wallace holds that rival publishers in this country have a legal right to use the contents of the original edition, except such portions of them as are covered by copyrights secured by American authors. The defendants' work he finds has substituted articles for these copyrighted ones.

HAS JURISDICTION.

Application for a Writ of Prohibition in the Behring Sea Case Granted.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—In the supreme court of the United States to-day Chief Justice Fuller announced that the court had decided to grant the British government leave to file an application for a writ of prohibition in the Behring sea matter.

A rule directing the district court of Alaska to show cause why the writ should not be issued was made returnable on the second Monday in April. The chief justice said, in delivering the decision, that the supreme court undoubtedly had jurisdiction in the matter.

A TERRIFIC STORM.

Terrible Sub-Zero Weather in Nebraska and South Dakota.

OMAHA, Feb. 3.—North Nebraska and South Dakota are enveloped in a terrific storm. At Deadwood it is 20 deg. below zero; at Lead City 30 below, and at Galena 40. Many herds of cattle have been lost, and destitute settlers will suffer.

IN COLORADO, TOO.

TOPEKA, Kan., Feb. 5.—A terriffic storm is raging along the Rock Island's Western lines. The train from Denver is reported to be six hours late. The storm is said to be the worst at Claremont, Colo., and no trains are being moved at that point.

Another Legal Knot to Untie.

HELENA, Mont., Feb. 3.—Chief Justice Blake to-day, on application of Henry A. Root, contestant for the Davis millions, granted a writ of prohibition on the district court of Silver Bow county and a writ of mandamus on Judge J. McHatton, of the district court of Silver Bow county, returnable to-morrow. The probate of the will cannot go on until cause is shown why it cannot be restrained. It is alleged that the jury is illegally drawn, and that both judge and jury are prejudiced. Col. Ingersoll will argue on the motion to-morrow before the supreme court.

DYING BY INCHES.

Horrible Appearance of a Woman Supposed to Be Afflicted With Leprosy.

DURAND, Wis., Special, Feb. 3.—A case of leprosy has been reported to the state board of health. The patient afflicted with the loathsome disease is an English woman about sixty years of age. She is a resident of the town of Canton, and just adjoining Pepin county. The local board of health has been discussing her case for the past four or five years, but nothing has been done by that body, and so finally it has been laid before the state board of health, and it is hoped by all people of this community that steps will be taken immediately to stop its propagation.

There has been considerable dispute among the physicians here whether or not it was a true case of leprosy, and so it will probably be necessary to have specialists examine the patient. The case is described as having a "horrible physique." The phalangeal and metatarsal bones of the feet have literally fallen off by degrees, as have also the tissues and bones of the hands and part of the face, presenting the appearance more of the so-called live type of the disease.

The woman lives alone with a small girl as attendant, who is her grandchild. She is very shy and does not permit strangers to come near. Only near relatives can scarcely see her. Moreover, she is inclined to resent any overtures on the part of curious people, or any one who might wish to see her, being somewhat of a violent disposition. Her lower jaw is partly eaten away, and she is conscious of her appearance, as she wears a cloth or veil over her face, and also over other diseased parts.

The only point upon which the diagnosis of the disease is doubtful to some of the local medical men, is the seeming non-contagiousness of the disease, although a young lady died a year and a half since who was thought to be similarly afflicted.

Another matter under consideration in this disease is the long period of incubation, which may extend over a period of twenty-five years, according to eminent authorities. Should this theory be correct there is no telling of the number who may develop the disease in the future, as the woman has a number of children who have almost all attained their majority, and consequently they have had more or less association with the mother since she became afflicted, which was about twenty years ago.

ROLLING MILLS SHUT DOWN.

This Action the Result of an Attempt to Reduce Puddler's Wages.

POTTSTOWN, Pa., Feb. 3.—This morning the entire iron works of the Ellis & Lessig Steel and Iron company in this city shut down, throwing seven hundred men out of work. This action was taken because of a contemplated reduction in the wages of puddlers of from $4 to $3.50 a ton to go into effect to-day. During the past two weeks conferences have been held, but an agreement could not be reached. The men offered to accept $3.75, while the company refused to grant the offer. President Lessig, of the company, says the unfavorable and unsatisfactory condition of the iron trade at the present time justifies the reduction. The price paid in Reading for puddling is $4 per ton. In Pittsburg the price is $5 and $5.50 per ton.

FOLLOWED THEIR EXAMPLE.

READING, Pa., Feb. 3.—The puddlers of the Brooke Iron Company of Birdsboro, this county, have refused to accept the proposed reduction of 25 cents from $3.75 to $3.50 per ton and the rolling mill closed down to-day. The stopping of work in the rolling mill also necessitates the closing of the nail factory. About 450 hands are thrown out of employment. The firm stated that wages were cut in accordance with similar action on the part of Ellis & Lessig at Pottstown.

REDUCTIONS MADE.

BETHLEHEM, Pa., Feb. 3.—One thousand employes at the steel mill of the Bethlehem Iron company suffered a reduction in wages averaging 10 per cent. Depression in the trade is attributed as the cause.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, Feb. 3.—A reduction of about 10 per cent has been made in the wages of the workmen at the Emma blast furnace, the property of the Union Rolling Mill company, taking effect to-day. The cause is the competition of Southern furnaces.

TOPEKA, Kan., Feb. 3.—A movement is being inaugurated here to unite the free silver Republicans in the West in demanding the appointment of Western man for secretary of the treasury. A resolution will be introduced in the senate asking the president to appoint a successor to Secretary Windom, a man whose views are in accord with the views of the people of the West on the monetary question, and further that the requests be sent to other Western state legislatures to co-operate in the effort by sending like petitions to the president.

IN FAVOR OF FOSTER.

WORK OF CONGRESS.

Resume of the Important Measures Consined by Congress the Past Week.

What is Being Done by the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington.

Tuesday Jan. 27.

SENATE.

In ascertaining the position of Senator Stanford to be against the force bill, the advocates of the measure give up all hopes of its passage. There are some that regret the loss of the bill and many are relieved. The business of the session can now proceed without interruption, and probably all necessity for an extra session will disappear.

HOUSE.

There was a general discussion in the house on several subjects not under consideration. After a long fight on the approval of the journal the house took up the military academy bill, which led to a discussion of the late Indian war. Several members wanted an investigation of the Wounded Knee battle. Mr. Spinola of New York took hold of the force bill, which he shook vigorously, and took occasion to say that the action of Southern legislatures on the force bill and the world's fair was no bluff. The house adjourned without action on the military academy bill.

Wednesday, Jan. 28.

SENATE.

The house apportionment bill was taken up, and Mr. Hale, who had reported it from the census committee, explained and advocated the house bill, and argued against the amendment proposed by the minority of the committee.

HOUSE.

The house adopted the conference report on the bill for the disposal of the abandoned Ft. Ellis, Mont., military reservation under the law.

The speaker laid before the house the resignation of John H. McCarthy, as representative from the Eighth district of New York. The house then went into committee of the whole on the military academy appropriation bill.

Thursday Jan. 29.

SENATE.

Senator Davis' amendment to the apportionment bill was defeated to-day by a majority of one. It was stated that, had not Mr. Dunnell went to Republican senators and scared them by asserting that any amendment to the bill would defeat its passage, the Davis amendment would have been adopted. About a dozen senators had assured Davis and Washburn that they would vote for the bill, but this morning took it back, alleging that they could not risk the defeat of the bill when their states would gain one or two representatives. The result was the defeat of the amendment, although Senators Casey, McMillan, Paddock and Stewart voted with the Minnesota senators.

HOUSE.

The sundry civil, as completed by the subcommittee having it in charge, carries the largest appropriation of any similar bill for many years, footing up probably more than $35,000,000. This is due to heavy appropriations for public buildings heretofore authorized to be built, to harbor improvements, to a special appropriation of between $600,000 and $700,000 for the government buildings, and government exhibit at the world's fair in Chicago, and to $1,000,000 for the census.

Friday Jan. 30.

SENATE.

HOUSE.

An air of sadness pervaded the chamber this morning, and the prayer of the chaplain was listened to with unusual intentness, as he asked God's blessing upon the wife and children of the dead secretary.

The following resolutions were introduced by Mr. McKinley:

Resolved, That this house has read with deep regret of the death of Secretary William Windom, who for 10 years was a representative of this body, and who for 12 years was a member of the senate.

Resolved, That a committee of nine representatives be appointed by the speaker to join such committee as may be appointed by the senate to attend the funeral of the late secretary and to take such other action as may be to honor his memory.

Mr. Dunnell—I second that motion. I have the honor to represent the district, which for ten years was represented by the honorable secretary of the treasury whose death we deplore, and who was for 22 years a representative of this branch and in the senate of the state of Minnesota.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. McKinley—As a further mark of respect, I move the house do now adjourn.

MINNESOTA SOLONS.

Condensed Proceedings of Both Branches of the Minnesota Legislature.

What is Being Attempted in the Way of Legislation by Our Lawmakers.

Friday Jan. 23.

SENATE.

The first question to raise a breeze was a joint memorial to congress, presented by Senator Donnelly. This memorial prayed for the passage of the Butterworth bill prohibiting the dealing in options. There was a long preamble in which the enormity of the crime of gambling in agricultural products was referred to, and the statement made that dealing in options had covered the country with mortgages and produced such a state of discontent that portions of the country were "perilously near revolution."

Senator Stevens offered an amendment which would make the paper more pertinent, and it was likewise adopted. Then all reference to revolutionary feelings was stricken out, and the language otherwise modified, and the amended memorial was adopted, only Senator Morse voting in the negative.

The resolution was passed.

Saturday, Jan. 24.

SENATE.

The president called attention to the fact that the senate had not fixed the salary of the clerks of committees, except that of the clerk of the judiciary committee, and Senator Donnelly offered a resolution providing that committee clerks should receive $5 per day. President Ives stated that this would reduce the salary of the judiciary committee clerk, which had been fixed at $10, and the resolution was amended to prevent this and then adopted.

Senator Donnelly made a characteristic speech in favor of Mr. O'Brien.

At this point Senator McMillan offered a resolution declaring that J. S. O'Brien was, and J. M. Searles was not, entitled to a seat in the senate from the Twenty-third district.

HOUSE.

The house only sat for half a day yesterday, but it had a merry time over a resolution introduced by Mr. Keyes asking for the continuation in office of Warden Randall, of the Stillwater prison, until March 1. This proposition caused a long and heated discussion. Some of the members held that the resolution was not consistent with the law and that it was infringing the rights of the state executive, and wrongfully upsetting the acts of the board of prison managers. It will be remembered that Warden Randall resigned at the December meeting of the prison board, and his resignation, although reported to have been withdrawn, was accepted at the January meeting, and Albert Garvin of St. Cloud appointed to succeed him, and assume to office on Feb. 1.

Several members, including Mr. Lomen, opposed the passage of the resolution for the reasons that it would have no force if passed and would be infringing upon the prerogative of the state executive and an organized board.

THE RESOLUTION LOST.

At length a vote was taken on the motion to suspend the rules; sixty-seven members voted aye, and, as the motion to carry requires a two-thirds vote of the house, or seventy-six votes, it was declared lost, and Mr. Keyes' resolution then went over on Mr. Diment's notice of debate.

It is Mr. Keyes' intention to call up his resolution this morning, and, unless there is a great change of heart among the members, it will most probably be passed. It may also be introduced in the senate, and if passed there the objections to its legality, it is said, will be overcome.

Every Man His Own Waiter.

New York World: Several lunch rooms in this city supply quick service because the patron helps himself. All he has to do is to satisfy his appetite and thirst at buffets and then pay his check as he rushes out.

This remarkable system is known as "Trusting-to-a-man's-honesty plan of quick lunch service." The first restaurant of the kind was started in Broadway, near Cortlandt street, several years ago. It succeeded so well that others imitated its methods.

As the names of the places imply, the owners trust entirely to a man's honesty to be repaid for what he has eaten. Many men throughout the lower part of the city do not have time during their business hours to take luncheon, especially where they have to go to a restaurant, hang up their hats and coats, sit down to a table and wait to be served, and to these men the new plan is a boon.

When a man plunges into one of these plaaces at noon he makes a dash for one of the long counters, where delicacies are plentifully spread. When his eye strikes some tid-bit that suits his fancy he helps himself to it, and at the same time orders a beverage from one of the white-aproned men standing about. It is either coffee, tea, chocolate or milk, and in less than ten seconds it is standing before him on the sideboard, not in a dainty cup and saucer, but in a big, plain mug.

Thus he stands up before the little space on the counter which, for the time being belongs to him, and munches away at his food with frequent sips from his mug.

When he gets his first selection down his throat he walks to another sideboard and selects some other kind of delicacy.

Of course there are clerks and cashiers in each of the restaurants, but none of them seem to pay any attention to the wanderings of a customer. He is free to go where he pleases and select everything and anything he likes.

In a little place of this sort in Nassau street the customer walks to the desk after he has finished eating, or more probably while chewing his last mouthful, and says to the cashier:

"Two ham sandwiches, custard and coffee."

"Twenty-five cents," says the cashier, and the bill is paid.

The regular customers, however, know the prices of all the goods, and walking to the counter lay down a bill and say, "Twenty out" or "thirty out," as the case may be, or perhaps the exact change.

In Broadway lunch rooms the customer has to figure out his own bill. To every dish is attached a card announcing its price and on the walls are hung placards giving the prices of all the dishes.

When a customer has finished his lunch he goes up to a little rack, takes out a check from one of the rows, throws it on the cashier's desk with the amount of money it calls for and walks out. The correctness of the check is never questioned. The customer's word is taken every time. The men who have put up their cash to back this system claim that the percentage of customers who deliberately cheat the house and get more to eat than they pay for is very small.

Did Not Trouble Him.

Yankee Blade: When Sam Jones was preaching in a Western town some time ago he was annoyed by a young man who was whispering to his girl. Finally the preacher could stand the interruption no longer, so he looked straight at the young man and said:

"I will pause until the young man in the back of the room gets through talking."

The silence was intense, and every eye was on the young man, who was still whispering to his girl. He had been so busy that he had not caught the preacher's censure. Mr. Jones repeated the remark, and this time the young man heard him. Not an instant did he hesitate, but he immediately tried to square himself. While everyone was watching him he looked squarely at the preacher and said:

The liabilities of the institution are about $50,000, and there is not $10,000 to pay the depositors.

Slayton Gazette: A beautiful mirage was visable last Saturday morning. Slayton appeared to be the center around which the surrounding country rose in a gradual slope like the terraced seats of an amphitheater. Iona appeared to be only about one-third of its real distance from us, while its streets appeared turned toward us at an angle of about 10 deg. Away to the south farms there are ordinarily below the horizon were plainly visible for miles.

A meeting was held at Brainerd for the purpose of framing a bill to place all the unimproved lands belonging to the several railway companies on the taxation lists. About thirty delegates were present, representing most of the northern portion of the state. The committee appointed was instructed to immediately commence framing the desired bill. A committee of two from each county were appointed to meet at Wadena, Feb. 10, to take further action.

Col. Albert M. Lea, after whom the village of Albert Lea, was named, died recently at Corsicana, Tex., at the age of 82. He was born in Tennessee, was a West Point graduate, and at one time served as acting secretary of war for six weeks under the administration of William Henry Harrison. At the breaking out o the war he joined the confederate army and while participating in an engagement his son was killed among others of the union forces, the father pronouncing the burial service.

A short time ago communications appeared in the St. Paul Globe dated from Howard Lake, in which details were given of the alleged birth of a monstrosity near Plato, McLeod county. Reflections of a shameful character were cast upon the lady and it was represented that she gave birth to a child which bore a striking resemblane to the devil. The story was an outrage fornication, and the family as well as the whole scandalized community, demand retraction and reparation.

At Belle Plaine a large stone was thrown through the upper part of a window of the residence of E. E. Chamberlin, supposedly to attract his attention to that part of the house. A moment later a shot was heard and a heavy charge of buckshot crashed through the lower portion of the window, but fortunately Mr. Chamberlin was absent at a neighbor's. The assault is a surprise to every one as he is a much respected man and has no enemies, and had lately been appointed postmaster at this place and the appointment confirmed. There is no clue to the perpetrator of the deed.

The opinion of the supreme court will be obtained.

SINGLE TAX DEPARTMENT.

THE STORY OF A CORNER.

At various times between 1807 and 1814 Jean Baptiste Charles Lucas acquired the property which is now embraced between the following streets in the city of St. Louis: Fourth street, Jefferson avenue (which is now Twenty-fourth street), Market street and St. Charles. This bit of ground is twenty blocks long and five wide. It is the heart of St. Louis. Mr. Lucas paid for it $1,364 in "hard money of the United States." Up to the time of his purchases, shaved deerskins at two and one-half pounds to the dollar had been the medium of exchange. "Hard money" was preferred and was not plentiful. The purchasing power of a "hard dollar" is difficult of comparison with the money of to-day; but it was probably worth in St. Louis from forty to fifty per cent. more than the dollar of 1890. Accepting the latter, Mr. Lucas's land cost $2,046.

In 1816 Mr. Lucas added by deed a strip of ground, five by five block, to the town, but it was some years before the limits of the town extended to include this addition. I think it was about 1826 when the western limit was moved from Fourth street to Seventh street, and about 1848 when it went west to Twelfth street. If I am right about the last date, and I think I am, the southeast corner of block 183, which is bounded on one side by Chestnut street and on another by Seventh street, was not within the city limits when, in 1835, James Brotherton bought it from J. B. C. Lucas for $1,596 hard money of the United States.

This little bit of ground was just 1-400 of the ground Mr. Lucas had bought between nineteen and twenty-eight years before for $1,364.

Mr. Brotherton conveyed this quarter block to his sister, Mrs. Matilda Settle, for $5, in 1844, and her husband several years later built upon it a row of five brick houses fronting on Chestnut street and two frame houses fronting on Seventh street. In 1874 the two frames were renting for $600 per year. The corner brick house (used as a saloon) returned $1,000 per year, and the other four houses in the row returned $600 per year each. That was not less than twenty-five years after the houses had been built. They had deteriorated through age and use, but the loss in these directions had been made up by the growth of the city about them. How many years they had been earning $4,400 I do not know, but it is reasonable to suppose they never earned much less.

In 1866 the quarter block, with all of its improvements, was assessed for taxation at $26,230, and paid State, county, school and military tax amounting to $419.68.

George T. Settle inherited this property from his parents, and in 1870, when a commission was looking for a site for a custom house in St. Louis, he offered this for $80,000. The commission agreed to buy, but changed its decision and bought a block two blocks away. In 1874 Mr. Settle sold the property to Henry Corwith of Chicago for $60,000. It was assessed that year at $50,550, the taxes amount to $700.11, and the income was, as I have said, $4,400 per year.

Mr. Corwith spent little for repairs, but the city required $162.33 in special taxes for the improvement of the two adjoining alleys, and $2,344.14 for the paving of the streets on two sides of the property with granite blocks. The assessment fell off to $38,050 in 1881 from $50,550 in 1874; but the tax rate had been increased, and while in the earlier year the amount was $700, it was now nearly $1,000. In 1884 the assessment had advanced to $50,400, and the taxes to $1,285.20. In 1886 the assessment fell $400 and the taxes $35.20.

Jay Gould bought the property in 1887 for $83,000. The buildings on it were very poor, but were still renting for between $2,000 and $3,000. Mr. Gould was then asking favors of the municipal assembly for his railroads, and to conciliate St. Louisans he caused an announcement to be made that he intended to build a ten-story structure on this ground. To give color to this he caused the old, unsightly buildings to be removed.

In 1888, when the assessment was made, the quarter block was bare, save for some worthless foundation stone, and had no more value, apart from its nearness to large numbers of men and to centers of trade, than it had when Pierre and Joseph Becquette, Louis Ride, Rene Kiercerau, Louis Bissonet and Joseph Gamache cultivated that and adjacent land in the fear of Indians and sight of the fort. However, the assessors, probably taking into consideration the fact that Mr. Gould had paid $83,000 for the property, assessed it at $60,030, and the tax bill that year was $1,380.69. The land yielded Mr. Gould nothing. He would have paid the same amount of tax in 1889, but before the taxes for that year became due he sold the property to Daniel Catlin for $90,000. He had held the property seventeen months and had a gross profit of $7,000 out of it. If you charge against that the $1,380.69 taxes you leave $5,619.31, which is equal to seven per cent. on Mr. Gould's investment.

Mr. Catlin did even better. He paid the tax bills of 1889 and 1890—the latter amounting to $1,535.16 on an assessment of $69,780—though on May 20, 1890, he had sold the property to Mrs. Catherine D. Wainright for $127,400. He had a gross profit of $37,400, and a next profit—leaving out of the calculation agent's commissions—of $34,484.15, in eight months, on an investment of $90,000. In the eight months of his ownership he had done nothing to the property. Gould had cleared it. Catlin left it cleared. From the fall of 1887 to October, 1890, three full years, this property was bare and unproductive. Yet its value increased more than fifty per cent. The community (that is, the city and State) took of this, in taxes, $4,296.54; Gould and Catlin took $40,103.46.

Mrs. Wainwright, having paid the penalty, has broken ground for a big building, and out of her tenants must come interest on the sum of her investment.

THE INDIANAPOLIS SENTINEL.

[From the Standard.]

The Indianapolis Sentinel would be better called the American Sentinel. From our first knowledge of it, it has been vigilant in correcting and courageous in proclaiming the dangers that threaten the liberties of the people of this country. It was an unwavering champion of the Australian ballot, to secure secrecy and independence from spoils brokerage associations in voting; and now it makes a declaration about the single tax, which falls but little, if any, short of a declaration of principles.

On the 14th of September last the Sentinel declared that "the tax on personal property ought to be wholly repealed," and went on to say:

The prospect is that the system of private property in land will remain as it is, for some generations at least, but that all taxes, at least for State and local purposes (except such as may be derived from the sale of franchises), will in the future be laid upon land.

This has been taken up by the Republican papers of Indiana, and the Sentinel and the Democratic party, to which it is attached, are assailed for having come out for "the theories of Henry George."

The Indianapolis Journal, a Republican paper, placed the quotation from the Sentinel at the head of its editorial columns, and suggested that the Democratic party "managers should invite Henry George to take a hand in their campaign;" and all over the State the Republican press bristles with indignation at the predicted coming of the single tax.

Some of the quotations are at least amusing. The Evansville Journal discovered that "the single tax cranks are Democrats and free traders in disguise;" while the Lafayette Courier advised "farmers who are favorable to the theory that land should be exclusively taxed for means to provide for public expenses," to vote the Democratic ticket. The Kokomo Gazette-Tribune wanted rather to extend the taxable things and so "reduce to a minimum the taxes that must be paid by farm owners and home owners." The Tipton Advocate, more just if not so so shrewd as its adversaries, told its readers before voting the Democratic ticket to be sure they understood "the single tax theory." The Middleton News thought "the single tax theory advocated by Henry George and indorsed by the Indianapolis Sentinel was "very pretty in outline but wholly impracticable," and sagely observed that "it would bear heavily indeed upon land owners if taxes for all public expenses were levied only upon land." The Newport Hoosier State, with a new idea as to the destructability of matter, was in great alarm lest under the single tax land should be "taxed out of existence," and proposed that men who favor a policy so destructive of the very ground upon which we stand, and the air we breathe "be sent to the insane asylum for treatment." And so on, through column after column of paragraphs, culled and reprinted by the Indianapolis Journal, the rural press of Indiana displayed itself for the benefit of the dear farmer, who is supposed to be an object of bitter hatred to single tax men.

The burden of these songs of the Indiana country papers is that the single tax would fall upon the farmer, because he is a land owner, and that the rich who do not own land would be untaxed. For a little while the farmer may be decieved by this kind of trickery. For a little while the farmer may suppose that a tax on land values would be a tax upon him. For a little while he may think that laws for the taxing of personal property are enacted in his interest and operate so as to fall upon the wealth of the rich. But he can not be long deceived. As Mr. Lincoln said. "You may fool all the people some of the time, and some of the people all the time, but you can not fool all the people all the time." This is as true of farmers as of other people. They will soon understand that taxes upon personal property are shifted or evaded by the rich, while farmers are forced to pay them, and that a tax upon the value of land can not be burdensome to a class like farmers, who, when they own land at all own land of very low value. The Indianapolis Sentinel is first in the field among all the established papers of Indiana, to call the truths of the single tax to the attention of farmers. The near future will prove its wisdom and bring it its reward.

What is necessary for the use of land is not its private ownership, but the security of improvements. It is not necessary to say to a man, "this land is yours," in order to induce him to cultivate or improve it. It is only necessary to say to him, "whatever your labor or capital produces on this land shall be yours." Give a man security that he may reap, and he will sow; assure him of the possession of the house he wants to build, and he will build it. These are the natural rewards of labor. It is for the sake of the reaping that men sow; it is for the sake of possessing houses that men build. The ownership of land has nothing to do with it. —Progress and Poverty.

The monopoly of the land gone, there need be no fear of large fortunes. For then the riches of any individual must consist of wealth, properly so-called—of wealth, which is the product of labor, and which constantly tends to dissipation, for national debts, I imagine, would not long survive the abolition of the system from which they spring. All fear of great fortunes might be dismissed, for when every one gets what he fairly earns, no one can get more than he fairly earns. How many men are there who fairly earn a million dollars?—Progress and Poverty.

The masses of men, who in the midst of abundance suffer want; who, clothed with political freedom, are condemned to the wages of slavery; to whose toil labor-saving inventions bring no relief, but rather seem to rob them of a privilege, instinctively feel that "there is something wrong." And they are right. —Progress and Poverty.

resented before the grand[illegible] of both nations, were a goodly pair to look upon. And the couple following them were little less attractive in their contrast.

Baron von Schlegen rode a massive roan, his great weight demanding even a heavier horse than the rider for St. George. His broad, bearded face was surmounted by a plumeless leather helmet; a tight hussar jacket and breeches of olive green and tasseled boots completed his dress, and he rode the deep military saddle of his service.

Ensign La Vega rode beside the German. A small, closely knit mare, white as milk in every hair, jogged along in a nondescript gait between a single foot and a dog trot. Her clean head, unhampered by breast band or martingale, stretched easily forward, her rider resting well down in his Mexican tree, stripped of every ornament and makeweight.

The lithe, wiry Mexican, dwarfed by the towering Teuton, only showed close observers the firm knee grip of his legs dangling straight down his horse's sides, and scarcely resting on the light wooden stirrups, just touched by the ball of the foot.

As they came well in sight, every eye resting on them in eager scrutiny, Dale Everett had risen from the general's box and crossed the stretch into the paddock. Leaning on the fence, wrapped in his long braided overcoat, he carelessly watched the group; but his quick eye ran over every point of man and beast and inventoried their weaknesses with the intuition of horsemanship.

"Which is the dangerous one, general?" he asked. "The Frenchman is favorite, seven to four; Capt. Cecil second choice."

"The Mexican," Everett answered, never moving his eyes from the horses. "He rides. Chavirac's horse is grand: the man will beat him."

"Is it known yet who rides for us?" the captain asked. "It was a cursed shame no one entered sooner, general. It warrants the sneer of these Creoles that all horsemanship followed Jeb Stuart out of the army."

"The challenge is open until 3," Dale Everett answered quietly. "I see Cameron has Jonathan in the paddock. Would you like to mount him and ride for the First brigade?"

"Do you mean it, general?" The old trooper glanced to where the sturdy groom could scarce restrain a plunging horse, hidden from muzzle to flank in a light cover. "Would you let me steer that horse fresh from the fields, over these hurdles and that stiff water jump?"

"What chance would he have against those four, trained for weeks?" Dale asked.

"Not a ghost of one with me on his back," the captain answered. "Only your hand could save him a distance."

"You old fox!" was the laughing retort. "You're sure the horse would lose, but try to flatter me! Hang it, Mosely, you're after the brigade adjutant's boots!" And with a laugh Everett turned away, gave a final, steady look at the group of riders, and passed behind the weighing stand.

Again the bugle sounded clear and shrill as the four contestants turned at the distance flag and galloped abreast by the crowded stands. Then, as if from one impulse in the vast multitude, rang out the wild applause. Shouts, clapping of hands and stamping of feet made rude accompaniment for the musical pat of dainty gloves and the rustle of waving parasols.

Again the applause rang out as the four riders passed the general's box with whips at salute, and the grim soldier rose and raised his hat. Then checking their horses in mid career Chavirac and Von Schlegen wheeled and fronted the judges' stand, dead silence again falling on the crowd.

For the third time the bugle sounded, and Col. Campbell, the senior judge, rose and read the challenge and announced the conditions of the race:

"We, Philippe Victor, count de Chavirac, staff captain of the army of France, and Heros, baron Von Schlegen, of the German lancers, as a friendly test of riding, do challenge all comers, not professionals, to a race of one and one-half miles, over hurdles and water jumps, as decided; each entry to ride his own horse; catch weights, no allowances, and no horse to have a record; the prize to be one lady's riding switch, and no rider to wager upon the result; race to take place over the Metairie track and inclosure not later than 3 o'clock on Monday, Feb. 8, 1866, and entries to be open until that day and hour."

Col. Campbell folded the document and added: "I call the challengers: Capts. Chavirac and Von Schlegen, such are your challenge and conditions?"

Both bowed their heads—the German silently, the Frenchman with the arrogant words:

"I made the challenge: I will ride and win it fairly!"

As the challengers turned towards the gate Col. Campbell called out:

"Do any riders accept the challenge"

Hoyne-Cecil rode up answering cheerily:

"I, Herbert Martindale Hoyne-Cecil, captain of her majesty's lifeguards, accept all conditions, and ride for England!"

"And I, Manuel Jesus de la Vega y Cambral, ensign Tenth Mexican battalion, accept all conditions!" cried the Mexican.

And the moment after the four rivals were about the scales, where a young quartermaster took their weights, for form's sake only.

"Is there any other accepting this challenge? All entries close at 3 p.m.," again called out Col. Campbell. He looked uneasily at his watch; it showed one minute left.

No answer came, and Chavirac, turning to the Creole near him, said:

"As I supposed! This Yankee Don Quixote who would ride untrained against me is Punchinello! Voila!"

Twenty seconds more of dead silence; then people began to turn their eyes from the judges' stand. It was evident that the rumor of an American acceptance was false.

Brilliant eyes flashed amused glances under long black lashes at the general's box, where his brilliant ribbons fluttered gayly, and then their owners, caressing the colors on their parasols, turned to their escorts with that pretty little moue that only the Creole woman can make.

All this for twenty seconds—time enough, with opportunity, to win a woman or to lose a world! Then a clear, sonorous voice, like the order to charge, rang out:

"Here!"

Round to front the judges rode a lithe, erect figure, in white shell jacket, blue breeches and red sash; a blue cap, and riding boots fitting like gloves and seemingly as light, completing the dress.

The horse he controlled with light hand was a jetty black, his coat shining like satin in the sun and his small head tossing continually, as though scenting the contest and eager to begin it. Rather long limbed for absolute beauty, his sixteen-hand height was enhanced by flatness of forearms that quivered with elastic muscle: but his depth of chest and long sloped thighs told of power and stay equal to the intelligence denoted by breadth between the eyes.

There was dead silence on the crowd. The Creoles, the Diegos, even the Germans and English—who had so applauded the known entries—had small sympathy with the unknown federal soldier; less with the flag for which he was champion.

As the rider first appeared a tall Pierrot, standing near the gate, had swung his hands together to start applause.

"Bah!" growled a scarred Sicilian near him. "You are French, from your dress. Why would you cry for the Yankee?"

"Canaille!" answered the Pierrot, "have you eyes? Cannot you see that he is a man and a rider?"

Just then the rider spoke a name that had penetrated Confederate lines many a time with echoes of gallantry in fight and gentle humanity in conquest.

"Here!" he cried, in calm, ringing voice that dominated the ear of the crowd. "I, Dale Everett, commanding the First brigade, Army of the Mississippi, accept this challenge in all its conditions, and ride for the United States!"

As he spoke the generous nature of the southron overcame popular prejudice, and applause roared and rattled from the stands, only to be sent back from the thronged stretch. Twice it died away, then swelled out louder than before, and the motion of Col. Campbell's lips was all the acceptance Everett received. As he turned toward the scales the Pierrot wheeled upon his neighbor.

"Tiens, Diego!" he said, "our people are only doing themselves justice. By that scar over your pretty nose you served the Confeds? So did I. Let us give him one good old rebel yell!"

The Diego smiled grimly and held out a horny hand to the Pierrot. In two seconds the famous "rebel yell," started by the two, echoed in its fierce wildness from every quarter of the field, and even around the general on the stand—the same curdling cry that had swung the tattered battalions over many an otherwise impenetrable breastwork, when

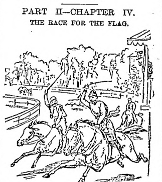
PART II—CHAPTER IV.

THE RACE FOR THE FLAG.



Jonathan gives a fierce rush, laps the mare and passes her with one bound.

The applause and fluttering kerchiefs had not moved the quiet soldier, absorbed in the trial to which he was going unprepared, for honor's sake. But the familiar war cry of his old foes brought a flush to his cheek, and his eyes glowed [illegible]

Cameron was at his horse's head. He swung lightly from saddle, and Hoyne-Cecil met him with outstretched hand, saying bluntly:

"General Everett, permit me! Hoyne-Cecil, of the Guards. Your name is known on both sides of the pond, really. Consider it an honor to ride against you today."

But De Chavirac, who had been keenly noting Jonathan's points, turned abruptly and, without introducing himself, said in French:

"Are you very sure, monsieur, that this horse has no record?"

Everett's eyes flashed into the Frenchman's an instant. The challenge he had just publicly accepted was unmistakably plain. Then he answered quietly:

"The horse has one record, Monsieur le Comte—a war record."

Chavirac turned crimson, for he had been military attache while his regiment was cut to pieces in Algeria. But just then the bugle sounded thrice; every man sprung to saddle, and the gallant, curveting quintet stretched into a warming gallop ere they bunched for the send off.

As they passed a keen gambler sitting on the gate cried out:

"One hundred to two hundred on France against the field! Nine to four against any named man!"

"Taken both ways!" cried a clear voice behind him. It was the Pierrot.

"Show your face," answered the gambler, gruffly. "Who the devil bets with a mask?"

"These are not masked," retorted the Pierrot, drawing a roll of bills from his breast. "Cover them in the hands of M. Pietro Bartol yonder. I name the Yankee."

The bet was made, and Adrien Latour whispered a few words in the willing ear of M. Pietro. Before the drum had tapped that worthy had set his tipsters to work and covered several thousands at the odds.

Turning near the distance flag as evenly as at parade, the five soldiers gave head and rushed down the home again, closely bunched. The Mexican led slightly, Everett and De Chavirac nosed on his quarter in mid-track, Hoyne-Cecil at the fence, and the German close behind him, outside. So they sped by the stand, going evenly. Col. Campbell gave the word, the drum tapped and they were off.

The course to be ridden was the track itself and a figure eight on the infield, entered by a hurdle at the first quarter. Thence a long straight pull, with hedge and blind ditch, led to the second gate on the track, where the course doubled down the back stretch and re-entered the infield for a quarter mile pull to the home quarter on the track. In this straight chute was the water jump—sixteen feet of water, scarped and showing full twenty-six feet of clear jump to make it. Once over this, it was flat racing home, save the fourth and last hurdle, thirty yards beyond the distance flag.

The speed had picked up at the first hurdle, the Mexican taking it first and gaining a length before Jonathan and L'Empereur rose together and skimmed it almost in their stride. The chestnut got over two lengths ahead of the roan, who lost ground in gathering for the jump. Down the chute in the infield they went for the heavier jump at the hedged ditch—which was taken in the same order, though the Englishman pulled farther away from the roan and crowded the black closer. But the steady Mexican mare, seeming bent on making the pace killing, widened her gap on the French horse at the second hurdle, though he took it easily and followed her down the back stretch in a splendid rush. It was plainly nobody's race, the horses not yet having shown their best, and the men all riding well in their differing fashions.

De Chavirac sat rather far back in his saddle, showing iron grip of calf and knee, but evident use of his stirrup. He rode, too, with a heavy hand, lifting the willing horse to his jumps by strong use of the bit. The German rode with heels down and short stirrup leathers pulled taut; but he sat his horse, and swung to the motion of the heavy brute. Hoyne-Cecil's was the English cavalry seat—the bent knees and feet thrust to instep in the irons. He rose to the leaps with his horse, till daylight showed under him, leaning far forward with the swing, as though to help the jumper over.

Everett and the Mexican rode almost alike. Each sat well down in his saddle, erect and easy, the leg dropping straight down, and holding only by strong knee clamp that left calf and ankle free. Both carried the foot level in the long stirrup, whose sole use seemed to be support for the weight of the lower leg, not as any aid to the seat. But it was in light, flexible feeling of the bit that both differed most from their transatlantic rivals. The latter held their horses and lifted them at every jump, not doing the light "wrist riding" that guides by barely feeling the mouth and keeps man and beast in perfect sympathy.

Just within the track was the third hurdle; gleaming beyond it showed the wide water jump, the test leap of the race. Everett felt it time to close the gap on the gallant little Mexican and shake off L'Empereur. A pressure of his foot, not of the spur, and a slight shake of the reins, were answered by a splendid rush of the black, that sent him to the mare's flank as she rose to the fence. Almost side by side the black and the white took the leap, skimming it with ease and without lifting to it. Then, with a quick backward glance, Dale Everett took in the field. Close behind him—so close he could almost feel the hot breath from the crimson nostrils—thundered L'Empereur, his lank head straight out, his eyes glowing as fiercely as those of the rider with set lips, who plied spur and whip at every bound. Behind, in easy reaching distance, Hoyne-Cecil's horse was going steadily and fast; thirty yards behind him Von Schlegen pounded on, practically out of the race.

Then, for the first time, Dale Everett spoke to his horse, and, to the amaze of Chavirac, now thundering by his side, he checked rather than urged the horse.

"So, boy! steady—so—o!" was his quiet call, and the bay shot by and kept a length's lead down to the water. For little by little the tremendous pace was beginning to tell upon the mare. But she still kept her lead, and once safely over the water there was a short quarter only down the homestretch.

No let up now in the pace. Scarce twenty yards ahead gleams the bright water, and La Vega raises his whip and swings it over the mare's ears with a "whoo!" as he sends the cruel spurs into her sides.

With whip and spur and voice De Chavirac urges his noble horse. He, too, sees that the despised Mexican once across the water, the sternchase might not be long enough for stride and bottom to tell.

And what both knew could not be unknown to a rider like the American. Tearing as the speed was, he knew his horse the freshest, and he felt a thrill as he recalled that Jonathan's speed had not yet been fully tested.

With a sharp, quick word, and scarcely tightened grip upon the bit, Dale touched the spur to Jonathan and rushed ahead, to reach the water even with the Frenchman and the white mare, gaining on them at every bound of the now well aroused black.

Thirty yards, twenty yards, ten only, between the white's nose and the water, the Frenchman lapping her flank, the black three lengths behind.

With a wild, uncanny cry La Vega raised the gallant little mare to the leap. Rising lightly, she cleared the water, but landed so perilously close to the bank that its edge crumbled under the heels that spurned it into the water, only the impetus of her rush keeping her steady.

And as the white mare landed from her leap De Chavirac—his teeth set, his eyes gleaming and his body bent forward as if to push his horse onward—drove both spurs into L'Empereur's sides and lifted him fiercely with the bit.

Dale Everett, thundering on, not three lengths behind, heard the sharp, clicking sound of snapping steel.

The terrible truth flashed into his brain, even before his eyes beheld its confirmation. The fierce tug of the eager Frenchman had snapped the right lever of the bit; the heavy right hand was suddenly released and the whole power of the pull thrown upon the left, just as the grand horse gathered for the spring. Swinging half round he pawed wildly in air—once! Then, unable to recover, he rolled over and fell heavily on his side, square across the ditch.

From the stands and partly from the track the full horror of the accident was seen—though its cause was not—before the spray of the huge splash fell back into the ditch. Women turned away their heads, and a wild terrified yell of warning went out from a thousand throats.

But what could warning do then?

What need, indeed, of warning to the man who had so often ridden calmly in the race of death?

Thundering on, his blood now aflame, his terrible hoofs not five yards away—almost already trampling prostrate man and beast—on, closer, faster, thundered the massive black!

And checking him neither by word nor bit—no, urging him hotly with voice and spur—his rider was as one blind to the dread mischance before him.

"Now, boy! Up, boy! Up!"

The bold, cheery cry rings out above tramp of hoof and shout of maddened men. Clear and strong it floats back to them with message of cheer. And with the words the firm hands steady on the reins; the lithe body swings back in the saddle, and as it sways forward both spurs go cruelly home.

Up goes the gallant horse, five feet before the leap is reached—up into a tremendous bound that straightens beautifully and sends him over prostrate horse and rider—well beyond the water. He clears the leap gallantly, but he lands in the very tracks of the Mexican mare!

The heavy hind hoofs are well up on that treacherous brink, but the pounded earth slips beneath them—once!

The horse has done its best. Now for the man's turn! Again that quick intuition, fostered only in discipline and in active warfare, called upon sure agility, bred only in the training of the cavalry school, and even as the horse's forefeet struck the bank Dale Everett cast loose his stirrups and braced himself lightly to the left.

As Jonathan's hind feet touched his master's hand pressed strongly on his neck, well forward, and with wonderful quickness the man had landed on the bank, his left hand grasping the mane, his right the cantel of the saddle. Thus lightened, the horse's instinct urged another trial, the man's strength and weight thrown into the scale; and, quicker than can be told, with scarce a break in his stride, the gallant black gathered for his next bound and took it just as the practiced hurdler swung lightly from the ground, using his rise for leverage, and dropped into the saddle he had quitted but the second before.

No stopping for stirrups now, no finesse of hands or head, no ear for the roar of voices, the distant clapping of hands—meed for that grand leap!

One thought only was in Dale Everett's brain—a thought that seemed to flash down the leathers and magnetize his horse. He must win that race! He had risked too much, for others and himself, to lose it now! And, answering the thought, the black straightened his great neck, stretched his lean muzzle level out, and strained every muscle to overtake the mare, flying along full forty yards ahead.

Scarce a quarter of a mile to do it, too; but man and horse were as one, and the longer stride told with every jump. Voice, hand and spur drove the black along now as he had not gone before. The gap was closing fast, three lengths—two—scarcely one! Once more La Vega called upon his mare, with voice and spur and whip. With final effort she answered grandly, mending the great pace already made.

Had Everett misjudged the stay and fleetness of the Mexican? Had he waited too long?

This is For the Farmers

PROF. D. N. HARPER ON SEED WHEAT. A WORD TO THE FARMERS—QUESTIONS THEY SHOULD ANSWER.

Mr. EDITOR—Through your columns I sent a letter last spring to many farmers in your locality on the subject of seed wheat. With your premission I should like to again avail myself of your valuable space in the same subject. In the spring I made examination of the wheat which many farmers intended to use for seed and reported my opinion as to to its quality. I also told him this could be improved by cleaning. Now I wish every farmer to send me a reply to the following questions and to leave at your office a small sample of the seed as planted and a small sample of the crop, each properly labeled. In addition to the questions asked please give as full an account as possible of the conditions of growth etc. so that we may know fully of the experiences of every farmer. Every one must see that only in some such way as this can we arrive at reliable knowledge of the result. I trust all will appreciate the value of this information and assist us in obtaining it. While it has been impossible for me to make the same personal examination as in 1889, the reports received show clearly that good results can surely be obtained only by seeding the right kind of wheat, and while opinions may differ as to the extent to which seed may be injured and still produce a crop, the results of the first few seasons show that it is not true economy to stint on the quality of the seed.

QUESTIONS.

1. What is the nature of your land, heavy loam or light and sandy? How old is it? 5. How did you prepare the seed bed? Do you summer-fallow? 3. Did you plant with a drill or broadcast? How deep did you drill it? 4. How did you clean the wheat before sacking? 5. How much did you seed to the acre? 6 How long have you used this same seed? 7. Where did you get the original seed? 8. Do you grow Blue stem or Fife separate? How do the results compare as to yield, time of ripening etc? 9. Do you stack any wheat? 10. Have you received any of the so called Ladog wheat? Please state result and your opinion of the wheat. I am requested by many farmers to inform them of people and places where good seed can be obtained. If you have any such wheat particulary of pure Scotch Fife please send me a small sample, and give a history of its growth, etc. I shall be glad to make examination of any sample of wheat for seed and report on its quality. Specially label any such samples.

No Medium Like The Newspaper.

The advertising man of a well known New York clothing house says: "We were the first to use the sails of vessels as an advertising medium. Then we got up the "alphabet puzzle" and gave away 500,000 puzzles while the craze lasted Afterward we invented the Waterbury watch idea. We had to do something because three of our principal competitors had failed, and their stocks were being sold for next to nothing by assignees; so we decided to give a Waterbury watch with every twelve dollars worth of goods purchased. We advertise the watches wound and set. To wind them fast enough we had to rig up a little machine worked like a sewing machine that would do the winding, and we kept several boys at work winding and setting them. Before we quit we had given away 40,000 of the watches.

"But nothing ever pays us like the ordinary newspaper advertising. The fact is there has come to be in this city a class of advertisement readers just as there is of news readers. They read the advertisements every day. Of course the man who wants to attract them has to get up an advertisement that will do it. The day of standing advertisments in the paper, 'Go to So and So's for clothing, or 'Go to this and that's for shoes,' has passed, just as the day for painting signs on rocks and fences or on the sails of boats has passed. You must have something interesting and fresh in advertisement, and it will be read.

Words of Worth.

By Waldo F. Brown.

It seems to me that there is no fact which needs to be impressed on young men just starting in life of greater importance than that their future success as business men depends very much on the habits of saving which they form early in life. In most town and cities building associations have been organized which offer all the advantages of a savings bank and are, I think, as a rule much safer. If the young man earning wages can take stock in one of these institutions it will be a good investment and a stimulus to him to save his wages and put the money where it will be safe and wait his opportunity to buy a home. The benefit of laying up $100 a year is not to be measured by the money that will accumulate, but more than this is the habit of saving and self-denial which will be built up. A modern writer has truly said: "There come hard experiences in most lives, when self-denial must be practised and many things which are desirable be done without, but it is to a great extent left to our choice whether this shall be during the strength and enthusiasm of youth, or when the infirmities of age are upon us." It is wise to bear the yoke in youth, for the carrying of one burden prepares us for the next. During over thirty years in which I have been an employer of young men I have had opportunity to note the habits and future history of many, and there is scarcely an exception to the rule, that those who set out "to have a good time" and spent their wages as fast as earned, have gone through life poor and have been men of little influence, while those who saved the larger part of their wages have become men of means.

County Division.

From the Thirteen Towns.

It keeps the papers that are opposing a division among the farmers to county division, and when they find one that says that he is opposed to it he is sure to have a complimentary and flattering local in their next issue. The public is informed that he has been in town and what his business was, although in all probability he had been in town a hundred of times before without attracting any particular attention, and the poor farmer wonders when he reads the next edition what change has come over him that he should be thus remembered, but their columns are not crowded with such locals, for the farmers are almost unanimously in favor of county division. They have watched the financial statement and corresponded with their brother farmers living in small counties, and they invariably find that the small counties are in every respect far more economica and better conducted than the larger, and that the taxes are in over instance lower. Besides they are a little bit afraid of the gang that is opposed of division, and know that they have never heretofore been known to look after their interests, and they can't help but have a feeling of contempt for the evious and selfish motives that actuates some of them.

Farmers' Store.

The farmers' store project is quite alive it seems, althougth not nearly all the shares—500—have been sold. The shares are $100 apiece and of course are sold only to farmers. We spoke to one interested in the scheme and he expressed himself as doubtful it the store will be established before next fall. As to the mode of conducting it, the goods will not be sold at cost, nor below a legitimate profit. Their prices will compare with those of the other stores here. The shareholders will merely realize a percentage of the profits for the entire year. The association must intend to lay in an enormous stock and build a fine store room if they propose to use the entire fund of $50,000. If only one share goes to each farmer in this district, it will have the most of them, and the trade of our merchants will be ruined just as much as if goods were sold at cost.

Traveling Churches.

The millionaire magnates, the opera singers, the grea showmen, all have their private cars, and now comes the church, building chapels on wheels which run to and fro in the earth diffusing religious intelligence. Bishop Walker, of the Episcopal Church of North Dakota, was the first to build a car fitted with pulpit, organ and pews, and the Minnesota Baptists are now building one for their Sunday School missionary, "Uncle Boston" Smith. Does it seem a little strange that the first church cars should be built in the wild Northwest? Well, it is just a way the Northwest has of getting to the front Just so with her railroads, always enterprising, seeking the comfort of thair patrons, guaranteeing speed and safety at the same time. WITH A PANTHER.

Thr story of the settlement of Ohio is replete with strange, and thrilling adventures. From the time of the arrival of Rufus Putnam's intrepid little colony to the close of the second war with Great Britain, the "Buckeye State" was the locale of startling events, some of which, if not properly authenticated, would read like the wildest chapters of fiction.

Some of the earliest settlers found their way through the unbroken forests to the banks of the Muskingum and there reared their cabins. These men were, for the most part, the heads of increasing famllies, some of the members of which were mere children, but these were as courageous in their way as their parents. The boys learned to handle the rifle as soon as they were large enough to carry it, and from that hour were looked upon to furnish the larder with daily supplies of game, which was not a very difficult task, for the forests were literally alive with deer, turkeys, pheasants and the like.

In addition to such game there were bears aad panthers and some of the most sanguinary encounters recorded in the settlement of the west occurred between the settlers of the Muskingum country and these animals.

Among the people who camo into the region I have mentioned, was Andrew Blossom, a hard pioneer in the prime of life. He built his cabin with the aid of his wife and son, the latter a robust youth of 14, very fond of roving in the woods with a rifle, and a good shot.

Tom Blossom was good natured, nearly always whistling, except when creeping after some wary game like a flock of turkeys, and it was not often that he came home with nothing in his game bag. He soon came to know the Muskingum forest like a book well read. Its trails were like turnpikes to him, and all knew that he stood in no danger of losing his way.

In building the cabin, Tom had stipulated that he should have the "loft" to himself, and was permitted to fit it up as he saw fit. It was not long before he had adorned it with trophies of the hunt, such as antlers, coon skins, turkey feathers and the like. The only window in the attic looked toward the west and across one end of the clearing. It was about fifteen feet from the ground, and Tom had raised a long ladder—a felled sapling with sticks nailed across—which reached from the window to terra-firma. He had done this for the purpose of getting to the ground without going down the ladder on the inside of the cabin and disturbing his parents, for on moonlight nights game was to be seen from the loft, and he was accustomed to following it across the clearing in hopes of a night prize.

In the summer time the window was not protected at all, but during the winter a piece of greased paper served to keep out the cold as well as let in the light, a very primative window, but it was all the settlers had those days.

"I saw the big tracks down in the gully again to-day," said Tom Blossom to his father, as the latter came back from a neighbor's "log raising', some ten miles from home. "They're uncommon big for a painter, but that's just what made 'em."

"Did you lose them?" asked the settler, who knew that his boy was as good a trailer as there was in the country.

"I follered 'em two miles over the roughest ground along the Muskingum, an' they went into a lot of timber where I lost 'em an' had to trudge home without a shot."

Tom's accent showed how bitter his disappointment had been, but when his father said that maybe the "painter" would come back and give him a chance later on, he took hope and after a while clambered up the ladder and went to bed.

"If I'd only got one shot," sighed Tom, looking toward the gully from his window. "In all my life I never saw such tracks for a painter. He must be bigger than Josh Ruggles dog. I couldn't begin to cover the prints with my hand. He may come back and somebody may get a head on 'im, and then I'd lose 'im altogether. My luck will be to lose the animile, for he evidently found nothing in the gully an' went home disapp'inted."

The young moon, just three days old, was climbing the treetops beyond the window when Tom heard a whistle at the edge of the clearing and with a cry of "Dick Chambers, I'll be bound!" he took up the rifle and made his way down the outside ladder.

Sure enough, Dick Chambers, a boy of his own age, and the nearest neighbor, was waiting for him. Dick had seen the large foot-prints in the gully, and had come to acquaint Tom with his discovery.

"They look uncommon fresh near the smooth rock," said Dick.

"What, near the smooth rock?" echoed Tom. "There war no tracks there this morning. "Let's go an' see."

The boy Nimrods sallied forth, crossing the clearing, and soon reached the spot where Dick pointed at the ground in triumph. Tom got down on his knees and looked for a moment with all eyes. Suddenly he gave a prolonged whistle.

"He's come back, Dick," said Tom, rising. "The old fellar is in the vicinity an' if we—"

Tom's sentence was cut short by the cracking twig, and the boys, looking up and in the same direction at the same moment, saw outlined against the new moon the head and shoulders of the panther. For a minute they seemed to forget their guns and stood like statues, as if the the apparition had deprived them of motion. The head was very large and fierce looking, and from Tom's mental calculation, the animal could not be more than twenty paces distant.

Shooting after night is a very deceiving sport. You are liable to make a very poor shot, especially when you have to depend on the light of the moon. Young though he was nobody knew this better than Tom Blossom, and when he raised his rifle it was with some misgivings, though he resolved to make the best shot of his life.

Dick Chambers held his breath while he waited for the crack of Tom's rifle, and when it broke the stillness of the night and the panther disappeared with a howl of pain, he cried out that the beast had been hard hit, and would have bounded forward if Tom had not pulled him back.

The boys did not advance to the spot where the panther had stood until Tom had carefully reloaded, but their caution was all for naught, for beyond a trail of blood which glistened in the light of the moon, there was nothing to show for the shot.

"It's too bad, but I had a touch of 'buck fever,' said Tom with a smile. "Mebbe we can find 'im yet'" and they scoured the immediate vicinity, but without finding the animal.

Indeed, they lost the blood trail altogether, and at last Dick bade Tom good night and went home. He clambered up the sapling ladder and put the gun away, then disrobed and threw himself upon his bed to think awhile of the big panther, and then to fall asleep to dream of the same creature.

Once, it must have been near midnight, for the moon had gone down, Tom was awakened by what appeared to be a long, strange cry from the forest, He went to the window and looked out, but saw nothing. He might have opened his eyes if it had been daylight, from eagerness to know what he was to discover the next morning, and after looking awhile, he went back to bed and was soon asleep again, this time sounder than before.

Tom Blossom had contracted the habit of getting up before the sun, and the earliest birds were twittering in the trees when he opened his eyes.

"I can foller the trail by daylight," said Tom, thinking first of the big panther. "If the beast is badly wounded, he won't go far, an' I may bag 'im after all."

He had barely ended when he happened to look across the bed and saw something that seemed to freeze his blood. If he had gone to bed alone, he now had a bedfellow, and the strangest one a pioneer boy ever had.

Lying almost at full length beside him, was the largest panther he had ever seen. The large head was buried between the fore paws, and the beast seemed asleep and totally oblivious of the attention he was attracting. Tom raised himself upon his elbow and looked steadily at the panther. He could see by the motions of the tawny hide that the animal was alive, and while he looked, the head moved and the eyes opened.

Realizing his danger, Tom dropped back and feigned sleep. He could hear his own heart, and felt that the panther was watching him with breathless curiosity, as much surprised as he had been a moment before.

Presently the panther arose and stood erect at the edge of the cot. Then Tom ventured to unclose his eyes and get a good look at his late bedfellow. He was surely the monster animal at which he had fired the night before. The beast had been wounded, for there was clotted blood on one side of the head, and the bed where he had lain was deeply stained.

The rifle was jnst out of Tom's reach, but even if it had been within his grasp he would not have seized it, for the slightest movement might have cost him his life.

The frontier boy continued to watch the panther till it moved toward the window, where it put its fore feet upon the sill and looked down the ladder. Tom could see that it was weak and panting, and his wish was that it would quit the loft without coming back to the cot.

Seconds seemed hours, to Tom, while he watched the big panther, and when it began to leave the window, climbing out like a cat, he breathed free once more. He did not move until he heard the panther going down the ladder, when he sprang from bed and jerked the rifle from its corner.

It was but a spring to the window, and the boy saw the animal making off slowly across the clearing, like a beast sorely wounded.

He raised the rifle and took deliberate aim, for now he had no moonshine to deceive him, and when the panther paused a second to look back at the house, as if loath to leave it, because of the good bed it contained, he pressed the trigger. The huge animal in the center of the little clearing, sprang into the air, and with a cry intensely human in its intonation fell back, to struggle for one brief moment in the grass.

The shot had not ceased to echo, when the door of the cabin flew open and the settler of the Muskingum rushed out.

"That's the big painter, father," cried Tom from the window. "I slept with 'im last night, an' he was goin' off without payin' for his lodgin'!"

Then Tom came down the ladder and told the story of the night hunt with Dick. Father and son agreed that the panther, badly wounded, had come back, as they discovered a pool of blood under a clump of bushes beneath the attic window, and that, seeing the leaning ladder he had clambered up into Tom's room, and dropped exhausted on the bed without so much as investigating who his companion was.

It was not long before Tom's adventure was known throughout the district and many came to see the panther, which was the largest ever seen in those parts. Tom Blossom grew to manhood, and when he was quite an old man he was wont to take little children on his knees and tell them the story of the boy who slept with the panther.

A SUSPICIOUS MAN.

Why He Would Not Hire Out His Team to a Stranger.

A young man in a Southern town applied to the keeper of a livery stable for a horse and buggy.

"Who is going along with you?" asked the latter.

"I am going to take my wife's mother out for a ride. She is not well, and I want her to have some fresh air. I wish that you would put a spade and a hatchet in the bottom of the buggy."

"What do you want them for?"

"I want to dig up some young cedar trees to plant in the cemetery."

"I don't think I can let you have a buggy,"

"Why not?"

"Because I don't want to be hauled up as a witness every time court meets. I have got my business to attend to."

"I don't understand you."

"Maybe you don't but I understand you. You have been married some years, and when a married man in this town wants to take his mother-in-law out for a ride for her health, and wants a spade and a hatchet and talks about planting things in the cemetery, that's all I want to know."

"But, my dear sir——"

"It may be all right, but I don't propose to take any risks. When your trial comes off you will swear there is a prejudice against you in this town and you can't get a fair trial, and get a change of venue to some county away off, and I'll have to go there as a witness every time the case is continued or be fined $40. If you want to get rid of your wife's mother, you go to a drug store and get some 'Rough on Rats,' and it will be a case of suicide or accident, but I am not going to be mixed up in it by supplying you with spades and hatchets and a horse and buggy to carry off the corpse to hide. No, sirree! Why don't you ask me to put a coffin in the buggy besides? No, sir; I am not that kind of a livery-stable man. I'm not in that line of business. I sympathize with you, but for the mere hire of a horse and buggy I can't afford to take any such risk."—Texas Siftings.

ADVICE TO THE GIRL SKATER.

Hints For Acquiring Grace and Security on the Ice.

The modern girl skater merits the description given her ancestress by an old chronicler, who writes that she went "as swiftly as a bird flyeth in the air, or an arrow out of a crossbow."

The best skate is one that clamps firmly on the heel and fits the edges so tightly it becomes a part of the foot itself, It should be accurately and perfectly steady if properly strapped to the foot: Laced boots for skating are to be preferred to buttoned, as they permit the freer circulation of the blood.

The beginner might advantageously carry a stick or light pole in the hand, But make a trial, learn to balance the body properly, and with a little confidence success will come very soon. It is wonderful how soon children learn to skate. Tiny little bodies, wee bits of womanly humanity, dart by their elder sisters so cautiously feeling their way, bright flashes of gold and silver, as it were, flitting by some unwieldy body of the deep.

The girl skater in learning ought never to look at her feet, should keep the head up, advancing the body, her face in the direction she is going, and the body slightly inclined forward, according to the first principle of gravitation, which in scientific language says: keep the center of gravity over the base. In skating all movements should be smooth and graceful and an effort made to keep quite free from jerking and awkward gestures. The art of stopping is soon learned. Slightly bend the knees, bring the heels together and bear upon them.

It may be accomplished by turning short to the right or left and, as you and I know, too often happens to us by sudden contact with what acts in place of terra firma and from no desire on our part to reach so decided a halt. The best skaters avoid swinging the arms. They are also careful to wear a close fitting dress, as full and loose clothes catch the wind and retard progress. A sensible skater never ventures on thin ice and, unless perfectly sure that the glassy rink will bear her weight, does not dream of putting on her skates.

And So Say We All of Us.

Church bells are gross offenders against the peace of Christian folk, and in England seem more calculated to irritate the sinner than soothe and invite the worshipper. We are not a musical nation in spite of our immense pretence in this direction, and our modern companology is perhaps the most intolerable in Christendom. The chimes at Antwerp or Salzburg, for example, will offend only the most sensitive ear, but a clamorous little bell, rung from a steeple at early morning and evening time with tinklings throughout the day, seems an instrument carefully designed to worry all the dwellers within its range. In an age when every room has its clock, and every adult his watch, this constant bell-ringing seems unnecessary.

It should be within the power of our county councils and municipal authorities to deal sharply with persons who create disturbance at night by shouting, screaming and singing. For the weary and hardworked citizen these discordant sounds are hard enough to bear, for the sick and restless they are intolerable. The hours of rest are none too long; by 6:30 or 7 the milkman's whoop is heard; the rattle of his cans and his foot on the area step announce that the day's work has begun.—British Medical Journal.

The First Typewriter.

I saw a few days ago a model of the first writing machine made in this country. It was patented in 1843 by a man named Charles Thurber, of Massachusetts, and is a really amusing affair in its very clumsiness. It consists of a wheel about a foot in diameter which turns horizontally upon a central pivot; the rim of the wheel is bored with twenty-five holes, in each one of which is a rod-bearing at the top a glass letter and at the bottom a similiar letter of steel. The paper sheet is so arranged that the line to be printed is under the rim of this wheel, and the letter wanted is swung into place by turning the wheel; when in place a rod bearing it is depressed until the steel letter or type touches the paper. I should say that even the fastest operator could not write more than half as fast as a man with a pen. Yet it was a writing machine, and Thurber succeeded in getting people to invest $15,000 in this curious device. At present there are no less than forty-seven different kinds of typewriters made and sold in this country, and in New York City alone there are said to be more than three thousand expert operators making a living by type-writing.—From the Charleston News and Courier.

The Maine Boy and His Pupil--How Elephants Quenched Their Thirst --Botany in Winter--From Youthful Minds,

Thought It Was "Pa."

They tell a wicked story of a scion of a distinguished Massachusetts family, whose members are noted for their frigid temperament. The gentleman was en route to Europe on a crack Atlantic flyer that just grazed an iceberg, narrowly escaping a disastrous collision. He was asleep in his berth at the time, but when awakened by the shock, said with great deliberation: "You need not knock again, father; come in."—From the Boston Traveller.

Botany in Winter.

No study is more absorbingly interesting to the careful student nor more necessary to the farmer than botany. Why not put in some time this winter studying it? "What, botany in winter?" you say. Why not? The Popular Science Monthly says: "I feel convinced that, if the teachers were not opposed to it, the subject would ere now have been more widely taught; and I shall therefore say a few words in anticipation of difficulties. It has been suggested that materials would be scarce in winter. Not at all. Let the children be familiarized with the observation and comparison of the peculiarities of a sprig of holly as contrasted with one of ivy; or let them be shown how different are the buds and leafless shoots of the beach from those of the oak or horsechestnut. Show them how to observe the bud-scales, how to infer the leaf-arrangement from the scars, how to notice the color, roughness, markings, etc., of the periderm; or give them introductory notions as to the nature of hyacinth bulb as contrasted with the potato tuber, confining their attention to points which they can make out by observation. Every nut or orange or apple that the child eats might be made interesting if teachers would dare to step over the traces of conservatism and introduce such ostensibly dangerous articles into class-work—and why not?"

From Youthful Minds.

Father—"Have you seen with the microscope all the little animals that are in the water?" Tommy—"Yes, papa, I saw them. Are they in the water we drink?" "Certainly, my child." "Now I know what makes the singing in the teakettle when the water begins to boil."

To Get the Most Good out of Books,

You should treat a book as you would a person with whom you are talking for information; that is question it, read it over and turn back and try to get at the meaning. If the book itself does not answer the questions you raise go to some other book, ask a dictionary or encyclopedia for an explanation. And if the book treated in this way does not teach you anything or does not inspire you, it is of no more service to you than conversation of a dull ignorant person. I just used the word "inspire." You do not read all books for facts or for information merely, but to be inspired, to have your thoughts lifted up to noble ideas, to have your sympathies touched, your ambition awakened to do some worthy or great thing, to become a man or woman of character and consideration in the world.

You read the story of a fine action or a heroic character—the death of Socrates, or the voyage of Columbus, or the sacrifice of Nathan Hale, or such a poem as "The Lady of the Lake"—not for information only, but to create in you a higher ideal of life, and to give you sympathy with your fellows and with noble purposes. You cannot begin too young to have these ideals and these purposes, and therefore the best literature in all the world is the best for you to begin with. And you will find it the most interesting.—Charles Dudley Warner in St. Nicholas.

The Maine Boy and His Pupil.

A Maine boy who is now a professor in one of our New England colleges used to teach town schools while fitting himself for his university course. Seated opposite to him on a railway train a while ago he related to me some of his early experience in teaching the youthful ideas. One strapping great girl, a woman grown, caused him considerable trouble because of her indifference to the beauties of education in general and "gogefry" in particular, for which neglect he caused her to put in considerable time after school in making up.

It reached the teacher's ears one day that this maid had declared to an admiring group that she wouldn't have her lessons on that afternoon, and if the teacher kept her after school he would have the privilege of sitting up one night with her at any rate before she would make the lesson up. This idea caused much excitement among the pupils who are usually ready to enjoy a teacher's discomfiture.

According to the program the young lady's lesson that afternoon was a complete failure, and she was told to make it up after school. When the session ended the other pupils lingered about with an air of expectancy to see the outcome of matters.

The teacher politely showed them out of the room, however, and then went in and shut the door. There sat the damsel with her arms defiantly folded and the book closed on the desk before her. The pedagogue cordially invited her to open the book and begin operations, but this had no effect whatever.

"All right," said he, taking out his watch. "I'll give you just thirty minutes to get that lesson, and if it is not ready at the end of that time I'll take you across my knee and give you one of the most comprehensive, unabridged, and able-bodied spankings that have occurred since Julius Cæar was an infant."

Then he took a chair with his back to the enemy. Surprise, mortification, tears and sobs ensued, but at the end of the half hour the lesson had been learned—two lessons, probably.—Lewiston Journal.

How Elephants Quenched Their Thirst.

One day a circus and menagerie train halted at the railway station on its way through a town. Of course there was a great curiosity among the railroad men to inspect this queer special train; and among others the engineer and the fireman of one of the locomotives in the yard left their posts for a short time to see the different menagerie cars.

When they came back and were ready to move their locomotive, they noticed that the cover of the water-tank was open. Further they luckily discovered that the tank was nearly empty—although it had been full to the brim when they left it.

Such an extraordinary thing had never happened before! No wonder there was great surpries on all sides; every one knew the tank was full when the men had left it; in fact, some of the "hands" had seen it filled, neither was there a leak in it, and yet the tank was empty. The question was, Where had the water gone?

Seven thirsty elephants, shut up all day and all night in a car that gave them hardly room to move, their warm bodies fairly touching one another, a paltry allowance of water to quench their thirst, and then to be left standing on the hot railroad-track, the sun's rays pouring down upon the roof of the car, and with only such air as could come through the small open windows! Was it any wonder, when their keen scent told them water was near that they should search for it? How were they to know that it was not there for their convenience. At any rate, no sooner were the men gone, when through a small window of the elephant car the dusky trunk of an elephant made its way sinuously out. Another followed its example, then another, until seven trunks had felt and snuffed around, over engine, tender and coal. What they sought was not there, but they still kept moving about, and, coming to the water-tank, one of them stopped, felt all over the cover, and at last managed to get the finger-like end under the edge of the cover. Then slowly and carefully it was opened; when, behold! there was what the elephants wanted—water, and plenty of it. The owner of that particular trunk took a long draft, its companions meanwhile shoving and pushing one another in their anxiety to drink. One after another they filled their trunks with the cool water, and poured it down their dry, parched throats. How grateful! How refreshing! After the long dusty ride, with what keen enjoyment they squirted the water over their tired, hot bodies, until they were cool and comfortable.

The mystery of the empty tank was a mystery but a short time. The keeper of the elephants, on visiting the car, had found it and the elephants deluged with water. A few inquiries, and the matter was explained to every one's satisfaction.—January St. Nicholas.

Thackeray's Pictures.

Who that loves Thackeray forgets the sense of fitness which has recommended to him drawings insufficient in themselves and weak in their execution, but so evidently imbued with the living literary conception? That he could not satisfactorily illustrate the thoughts of others we have abundant evidence, but where have we ever seen book illustrations more hopeful to the right understanding of the master's thought than those in the "Christmas books" of Mr. Michael Angelo Titmarsh, or in "Dr. Birch," "Our Street," and "The Kickleburys on the Rhine?"

Who can forget, to name but one instance, the picture of the unfortunate "Miss Little, to whom fate had assigned The Milligan as a partner? Like a pavid kid in the talons of an eagle, that young creature trembled in his huge Milesian grasp." Here one feels instinctively at a glance that there has been no weakening of the spontaneity and impulse by the transmission of the conception from one mind to another.—Temple Bar.

TWO HUNDRED GRAINS.

How is That for an Elephants Dose of Morphine.

Some weeks ago the keepers of the animals noticed that "Princess" was, to use a technical expression, "off her feed," and a doctor was called to the big barn at Poplar and Linn. This professional gentleman was Dr. Cowman, a veterinary surgeon of this city, who attends to the medical needs of the animals for Mr. Robinson. Her complaint was diagnosed as an internal inflamation of some kind, but the exact seat of the trouble could not be definitely located. The monster patient steadily refused to take food after the first few days of her illness, and with exasperating shrewdness foiled all attempts to give her medicine in a distinguished form. The apples containing it were invariably refused, while those that had not been doctored were at once devoured. Subsequently the stuff was administered by force, but this seemed to arouse her anger and the doctor and his assistants were compelled to desist. For a couple of weeks she has eaten nothing practically, and the loss of flesh has reduced her to a gigantic skeleton. That she was in great pain was clearly apparent, for she stood incessantly waving to and fro, swinging her trunk much as a man would wring his hands while in deep pain. Her owner and attendants have been faithfully watching her and attending to her slightest needs.

Yesterday the poor beast appeared to be in such agony that the sympathizing attendants wept at her wretched appearanee. It was seen that she was slowly dying, and it is feared that by to-night she will have passed away. Her great body tottered upon the massive legs and her eyes that had appealed so long for the help which no one could give her began to dim. The only question has been now to lighten the pain of her last hours on earth. Tuesday it was decided to put her under the influence of morphine, and this was done.

The administration of the opiate was no simple matter. Dr. Cowman at first attempted to reach the vein of the brute by means of his surgical tools, but Mollie's tough hide resisted the little blades. Then he took a common jack-knife, whetted sharp as a razor, and sliced into the elephant's flesh, a section of which with the hide was removed. Then the enormous dose of 200 grains of morphine were introduced into the arterial system of the dying brute.

The result was gratifying for a time. Mollie's eyes closed in blessed unconsciousness, while her trunk ceased to beat the air in nervous sympathy with pain. Yesterday she became worse, and her death is expected at any moment by her attendants.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

"Modern Business Methods."

"Say, old boy, how's business?"

"Pretty hard, just now."

"Why? Is the circulation falling off?"

"Oh, I'm not in that line any more!"

"No? I thought you'd make a specialty of swearing up circulations."

"I'm employed now by the icemen."

"Cutting ice?"

"No. Same general line as before I'm getting up reasons for charging high prices next summer. It's very wearing this year. Last year was a good one though!"

"What's your scheme just now?"

"Microbes in it—very little to be found pure. Disinfected ice very high—brought from undiscovered Adirondack lake 5,000 above the sea."

"Do you think it will work?"

"Sure! Anything with microbes is a safe go with the public. But we have another."

"What's that?"

"We're hoping to get a bill passed putting a tariff on ice. Protect home industry against the Kanucks and Eskimos, and increase wages of the icemen. Terribly downtrodden class. Public full of sympathy. Father carrying ice all day, children dying of heat at home. Effective contrast."

"Any more?"

"Oh, plenty. Weather too cold this winter for ice cutters; several frozen to death while at work. Men demand enormous wages to compensate for risk and exposure, and employers must get back their capital."

"Do you like the work?"

"Well, it's brainy—but very wearing!"—Puck.

Two Converts of Sam Jones.

"Bill Arp" writes as follows on the Rev. Sam Jones: "He says that once he was preaching in a Western town and had got wrought up in his feelings and was going along tender and pathetic in his appeal to the sinners, when an old man got up and stretched forth his hand, and said: 'Brother Jones, Brother Jones, stop a minute—just want to shout a little and say, Bless God, I'm happy on the way. Yes, happy on the way.'" And he sat down, shaking and sobbing with joy.

"Sam paused for the affecting scene lend its influences to his preacher, and then said to the old man: "Well, my brother, don't you feel now like you had lost that fifty-odd years of your life that you spent in sin?"

"The old man rose up again, and said, 'Well, no, Brother Jones, not exactly. I can't say that. I wasn't as happy as I am now, put I did have a power of fun.'

"On another occasion, while a revival was going on, Sam observed an old man in the congregation who seemed to be much affected, and going to him he asked if he felt that all his sins were forgiven, The old man rubbed his eyes with a red bandanna, and murmured, 'Not all, Brother Jones, not all; but I think a majority o' 'em.'"

A THRILLING EXPERIENCE,

Remarkable Statement of Personal Danger and Providential Escape.

The following story—which is attracting wide attention from the press—is so remarkable that we cannot excuse ourselves if we do not lay it before our readers, entire.

To the Editor Rochester (N.Y.) Democrat:

Sir. On the first day of June, 1881, I lay at my residence in this city surrounded by my friends and waiting for death. Heaven only knows the agony I then endured, for words can never discribe it. And yet, if a few years previous any one had told me that I was to be brought so low, and by so terrible a disease, I should have scoffed at the idea. I had always been uncommonly strong and healthy, and weighed over 200 pounds and hardly knew in my own experience, what pain or sickness were. Very many people who will read this statement realize at times they are unusually tired and cannot account for it. They feel dull pains in various parts of the body and do not understand why. Or they are exceedingly hungry one day and entirely without appetite the next. This was just the way I felt when the relentless malady which had fastened itself upon me first began, Still I thought nothing of it; that probably I had taken a cold which would soon pass away. Shortly after this I noticed a heavy, and at times neuralgic, pain in one side of my head, but as it would come one day and be gone the next, I paid little attention to it. Then my stomach would get out of order and my food often failed to digest, causing at times great inconvenience. Yet, even as a physician I did not think that these things ment anything serious. I fancied I was suffering from malaria and doctored myself accordingly. But I got no better. I next noticed a peculiar color and odor about the fluids I was passing also that there were large quantities one day and very little the next, and that a persistent froth and scum appeared on the surface, and a sediment settled. And yet I do not realize my danger, for, indeed, seeing these symptoms continually, I finally became accustomed to them, and my suspicion was wholly disarmed by the fact that I had no pain in the effected organs or in their vicinity. Why I should have been so blind I cannot understand.

I consulted the best medical skill in the land. I visited all the famed mineral springs in America and traveled from Maine to California. Still I grew worse. No two physicians agreed as to my malady. One said I was troubled with spinal irritation; another, dyspepsia; another, heart disease; another, general debility; another, congestion of the base of the brain and so on through a long list of common diseases, the symptoms of many of which I really had. In this way several years passed, during which time I was steadily growing worse. My condition had really become pitiable. The slight symptoms I had at first experienced were developed into terrible and constant disorders. My weight had been reduced from 207 to 130 pounds. My life was a burden to myself and friends. I could retain no food on my stomach, and lived wholly by injections. I was a living mass of pain. My pulse was uncontrollable. In my agony I frequently fell to the floor and clutched the carpet, and prayed for death. Morphine had little or no effect in deadening the pain. For six days and nights I had the death premonitory hiccoughs constantly. My water was filled with tube-casts albumen. I was struggling with Bright's Disease of the kidneys in its last stages!

While suffering thus I received a call from my pastor, the Rev. Dr. Foote, at that time rector of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, of this city. I felt that it was our last interview, but in the course of conversation Dr. Foote detailed to me the many remarkable cures of cases like my own which had come under his observation. As a practicing physician and a graduate of the schools, I derided the idea of any medicine outside the regular channels being in the least beneficial. So solicitous, however, was Dr. Foote, that I finally promised I would waive my prejudice. I began its use on the first day of June, 1881, and took it according to directions. At first it sickened me; but this I thought was a good sign for one in my debilitated condition. I continued to take it; the sickening sensation departed and I was finally able to retain food upon my stomach. In a few days I noticed a decided change for the better, as also did my wife and friends. My hiccoughs ceased and I experienced less pain than formerly. I was so rejoiced at this improved condition that, upon what I had believed but a few days before was my dying bed, I vowed, in the presence of my family and friends, should I recover, I would both publicly and privately make known this remedy for the good of humanity, wherever and whenever I had an opportunity, and this letter is in fulfillment of that vow. My improvement was constant from that time, and in less than three months I had gained 26 pounds in flesh, became entirely free from pain and I believe I owe my life and present condition wholly to Warner's Safe Cure, the remedy which I used.

Since my recovery I have thoroughly re-investigated the subject of kidney difficulties and Bright's disease, and the truths developed are astounding. I therefore state, deliberately, and as a physician, that I believe more than one-half the deaths which occur in America are caused by Bright's disease of the kidneys. This may sound like a rash statement, but I am prepared to fully verify it. Bright's disease has no distinctive features of its own, (indeed, it often developes without any pain whatever in the kidneys or their vicinity) but has the symptoms of nearly every other common complaint. Hundreds of people die daily, whose burials are authorized by a physician's certificate as occurring from "Heart Disease," "Apoplexy," Paralysis," "Spinal Complaint," Rheumatism," "Pneumonia," and other common complaints, when in reality it is from Bright's disease of the kidneys. Few physicians, and fewer people, realize the extent of this disease or its dangerous and insidious nature. It steels into the system like a thief, manifests its presence if at all by the commonest symptoms and fastenes itself in the constitution before the victim is aware of it. It is nearly as hereditary as consumption, quite as common and fully as fatal. Entire families, inheriting it from their ancestors, have died, and yet none of the number knew or realized the mysterious power which was removing them. Instead of common symptoms it often shows none whatever, but brings death suddenly, from convulsions, apoplexy, or heart disease. As one who has suffered, and knows by bitter experience what he says, I emplore everyone who reads these words not to neglect the slightest symptoms of kidney difficulty. No one can afford to hazard such chances.

I make the foregoing statements based upon facts which I can substantiate to the letter. The welfare of those who may possibly be sufferers such as I was, is an ample inducement for me to take the step I have, and if I can successfully warn others from the dangerous path in which I once walked, I am willing to endure all professional and personal consequences.

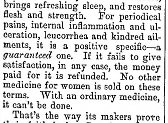
A WESTERN law paper quotes the following law recently enacted by the Nebraska Legislature: "It shall be unlawful for any person to fire off or discharge any pistol, revolver, shotgun, rifle or any firearms whatsoever, on any public road or highway in any county in the State of Nebraska, or within sixty yards of such public road or highway, except to destroy some wild, ferocious and dangerous beast, or an officer in discharge of his duty."



A building up of the entire system follows the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It's an invigorating, restorative tonic, soothing cordial and bracing nervine — and a certain remedy for all the functional derangements, painful disorders or chronic weaknesses peculiar to women. It improves digestion, enriches the blood, dispels aches and pains, melancholy and nervousness, brings refreshing sleep, and restores flesh and strength. For periodical pains, internal inflammation and ulceration, leucorrhea and kindred ailments, it is a positive specific—a guaranteed one. If it fails to give satisfaction, in any case, the money paid for it is refunded. No other medicine for women is sold on these terms. With an ordinary medicine, it can't be done.

That's the way its makers prove their faith in it. Contains no alcohol to inbriate; no syrup or sugar to derange digestion; a legitimate medicine, not a beverage. Purely vegetable and perfectly harmless in any condition of the system.

A Great Electric Railroad.

M. Baross, the Hungarian minister of commerce, our Vienna correspondent telegraphs, is not satisfied with the renown which the introduction of the zone tariff has gained for him, but is coming forward with another plan by which he proposes to give us the fastest train in the world. The plan is for an electric railway for passengers only between Vienna and Buda-Pesth. The distance of 156 miles would be achieved in two hours and a half. One railway carriage would start every ten minutes between 6 in the morning and mid-night. The only difficulty is the capital required for the project, which would be no less than 38,000,000 florins. The fare from Vienna to Pesth would be 10 florins. From the New York Daily News.

THE NEWS.

Official Paper of the City.

JAS. MEEHAN, JR. Editor and Prop.

Our legislators appear to be doing considerable work. The glittering generality acts that have been introduced the many resolutions of inquiry and investigation that have been presented all tend to prove that the average legislator might devote his time to measures of more importance, a law making quadriannual sessions for instance would be received with joy by the people and would no doubt be a sure means of an advance in gas at the capital city.

County Commissioner A. C. Rinehart comes and in a dirty screed denouncing editer Duffy of the East Grand Forks Courier and in his frenzy calls the editor of this paper a liar—for our statement in a recent issue, alleging the county commissioners gave a part of the county printing to a Dakota paper. If Mr. Rinehart can prove that the Fisher Bulletin is not printed in North Dakota and is not owned by a North Dakota man—we will acknowledge our mistake. We don't think Mr. Rinehart is justified as county commissioner in going outside of his own county to have printing done simply to pay political debts. Until Mr. Rhinehart satisfies the taxpayers of Polk County that the Fisher Bulletin is not owned by a gentleman who lives in Grand Forks he will be branded as a persistent falsifier. If the county commissioner in question is desirous of war he can have it. We would however advise him to close his bazoo until he has been attacked and not pose as the mouth piece of the commissioners. He has too much mouth to occupy this conservative position.

Senator Washburn ably advocated the cause of honest labor and told the partisans of the bill who were desirous of allowing a county to certain employes that these laborers are no better than the farmers who work upon the western prairie or the common itrsson of Minnesota. If the government employeys are favored why not make the eight hour law to encompas the overworked in every section of our great country. From the tone of Senator Washburn's speech we may conclude that the time of class legislation has run its race. Happily will it be for the people of this county when the law making portion of our government shall cease to favor a certain class. Then shall the the cause of centralization of power receive its death stroke and the fundemental principles for which the government was created, the one upon which our constitution was framedbe realized in a measure commensurate with the ideas of statesmen who in the early days of the republic sought to inculcates principles which would make our government simple and strong, even to the end of time.

When the Pen Was as Good as the Dagger.

The styles used for writing at about the beginning of the Christian era were almost as dangerous when in the hand of an excited Roman senator as a stiletto is in the hands of an enraged Italian. Cassianus, a refugee bishop who had set up a school in Rome, was stabbed to death by his scholars, who used a stylus as an instrument of execution. Cæsar himself once seized Cassius by the wrists and stabbed him in the arms with a stylus.—St. Louis Republic.

The Camera at School.

A correspondent of The St. James Gazette is responsible for the following story: A novel use has been found for the instantaneous detective camera. It seems that at one of the large public schools the rule is that when a form master is under the necessity of caning a boy he must not lift the cane higher than his own shoulder. Complaints were made that one of the masters habitually disregarded the rule; but as this was invariably denied by the castigator himself one of the young rascals determined to bring him to book.

Accordingly a detective camera was produced at the moment of punishment, the master's attention being otherwise occupied, and a proof struck off exhibiting, without possibility of doubt, the cane elevated beyond regulation point. The head master, to whom the photograph was shown, with a strict sense of justice condemned his subordinate, but at the same time promptly gave the scholar 400 lines for "playing in class."

They Staid for Breakfast.

An amusing story is told by the Nyack Journal: An estimable young lady living here has among her gentlemen friends a frequent caller from the interior of the county, who came down on Saturday to spend the evening with her. About 8 o'clock a Nyack gentleman came to the lady's house, also to spend the evening with her. The gentlemen were introduced to each other and soon became well acquainted. When the hours grew late each gentleman looked anxiously to see if the other was going to leave, but both seemed inclined to remain. The lady, full of mischief, evidently enjoyed the situation, and when at 6 o'clock on Sunday morning she laughingly explained the matter to her mother that lady insisted on both gentlemen staying to breakfast. The invitation was accepted, and the callers went away at 8 o'clock in the morning together

Care of Trousers.

"No trousers," said Mr. Taylor, "should be worn longer than six hours at a time. In case they are they lose their individuality; there is nothing more offensive to the eye than trousers which crease about the thighs or bag at the knees. As soon as removed from the person the trousers should be turned inside out and suspended laterally with the top (as the heavier part) hanging down; this removes every crease. It is unwise to keep pressing the trousers, for the intense heat of the iron soon destroys the firmness of the threads."—Chicago News.

Japan has a small but compact navy. It is well manned, the organization, equipment and administration are good, and, though much inferior in ships to the navy of China, Japan would be quite likely to hold her own upon the water in case of war with her neighbor.

A Philosopher at the Billiard Table.

One day Mr. Herbert Spencer sauntered into the billiard room at the Senior, and invited a nice young major, who was the only person there, to take a cue. The major did so. Beginning to play with deliberation the great philosopher gave a miss in balk. His opponent caromed off the red, and left off at thirty-seven with all the balls out of play. Mr. Spencer made another miss. Then the major ran out.

"Sir," the philosopher said as he gravely put his cue into its case, "a certain dexterity in games of skill indicates a well balanced mind, but expertness such as you have displayed is strong presumptive evidence of an ill spent youth. I wish you good afternoon!"—Rod and Gun.

Hot Water Cure for Neuralgia.

A towel folded several times and dipped in hot water and quickly wrung, and applied over the toothache or neuralgia will generally afford prompt relief. This treatment in colic works like magic. There is nothing that so promptly cuts short a congestion of the lungs, sore throat or rheumatism as hot water, when applied promptly and thoroughly.—Exchange.

A Kerosene Spider Trap.

A correspondent points out that kerosene has the power of attracting and destroying spiders. A cup placed under the tap of a kerosene reservoir to collect the drops was found to draw the insects by its odor and quickly destroy them.

Elegy Mongers.

One of the items of expenditure which became fashionable after the Restoration was the payment of rhymsters to write funeral elegies. Quite a host of poetasters traded on this fashion, and the specimens which Mr. Maidment collected of their effusions show that the majority would have been dear at any price. Neither in veracity nor in literary quality do these Scottish elegaic writers seem to have been better than he who wrote the famous epitaph of the lady who was "bland, passionate and deeply religious; she painted in water colors, and sent several pictures to the Dublin exhibition; she was first cousin to Lady Jones, and of such is the kingdom of heaven"—an epitaph which is even exceeded by an obituary notice of a Miss Wallace. Of this lady it was recorded that "Her conduct was beyond all praise. She engaged in ornamental working on glass, confided greatly in others, and died in squalid penury." As for the funeral poets, a casual perusal of Mr. Maidment's collection leaves the impression that if, as he says, the poetaster was a person as necessary as the undertaker, one would rather remain unburied than be so atrociously sung.—Scottish Review.

Good and Bad Effects of Sea Air.

The conversation in a little gathering up town on a recent evening passed to the effect of sea air on various things, including, of course, tobacco. One man told the rather curious fact that ale is often sent from England on a sea voyage to India and back, and its flavor much improved thereby. Another man remarked:

"A person who has always lived in this country doesn't know what good tea really is. No matter how tightly boxes of tea are closed before being shipped here from China, the sea air always manages to get at the leaf and causes its flavor to deteriorate materially. Any one who has drunk tea in Russia which has been transported overland appreciates the damage done by the sea air. In England, also, tea that comes from China over Europe and has to undergo only a brief sea voyage is prized much more highly than that which makes the entire journey in a ship."—New York

Wealthy Representatives.

Among the members of the house there are comparatively few who would not be compelled to resign should their salaries cease. Still there are a number of representatives who pay far more than $5,000 a year for the honor of serving their country in the halls of congress. Gen. Joe Wheeler, of Alabama, who is known in the Confederacy as "Fighting Joe," uses his salary to pay for clerk hire and printing. He sends out more public documents than probably any three or four other members of congress.

In addition he spends considerable money in having extra copies of his speeches printed. He has an office within a stone's throw of the Capitol, and when not needed in the house he rushes over there and directs the work of his clerks. He is one of the hardest worked men in congress. The general is a millionaire, I am told, and he finds the greatest enjoyment in his wealth in sending out these documents, so that his constituents may be thoroughly well informed as to national legislation.

Congressman Roswell P. Flower spends many times more than his salary in performing good deeds. Mr. Flower does far more good in the world than probably will ever be known, because he makes it a point of never letting the donations he makes to charity become known. Congressman Henry Cabot Lodge employs two or three secretaries, and these luxuries cost him more than his salary. But then, he is one of the rich men of the house and can easily afford it.

It is pretty safe to say that there is not any one of the New York or Brooklyn congressmen who does not lose money by serving in congress.—Washington Cor. New York Telegram.

Notice of Mortgage Foreclosure.

Default has been made in the conditions of a certain mortgage, and in the payment of the debt secured thereby, which said mortgage bears date July 31st 1882, and on said date was duly executed and delivered by Samuel Meunir, mortgagor, to the Colonial and United States Mortgage Co., (Limited) mortgagee, a corporation duly organized, and authorized to transact business in Minnesota, and which said mortgage was duly recorded in the office of register of deeds in and for the county of Polk, Minnesota, on the 31st day of July, A. D. 1882 at 4:45 o'clock p. m. in book "G" of mortgages, on pages 508, 509 and 510. That thereafter, to-wit: On the 16th day of August, 1887, said mortgagee, for value received, sold and duly assigned said mortgage to Albert W. Knaak, by an instrument in writing duly executed and delivered on said date, which said assignment was duly recorded in the register of deeds office in said Polk county, Minnesota, on the 5th day of September, 1887, at 11 o'clock a.m., in book 32 of mortgages, on page 410.

And whereas, there is now claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon said mortgage and the debt secured thereby, the amount of four hundred and seventy-six dollars, together with the additional amount of seventy-two dollars, paid by said asignee for taxes on the premises described in said mortgage, and interest on the taxes so paid, which amount is also claimed as a lien on said premises and secured by said mortgage and no action or proceeding at law or otherwise has been had or instituted to recover the debts secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale in said mortgage contained, and therewith recorded, which by reason of the default above mentioned, has become operative, and of the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed, and the land and premises described in and covered by said mortgage, to-wit:

The fractional north-west quarter (¼) of section number three (3), being the south half of said northwest quarter (nw¼) and lots numbered three (three) and four (4), government subdivisions of said section three, (3) in township number one hundred and fifty-one (151) north, of range number forty-two (42) west, containing one hundred and fifty nine 16-100 acres, and situated in the county of Polk and state of Minnesota, will be sold at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage and debt secured thereby, taxes and interest, together with all foreclosure expenses and lawful disbursements including twenty-five dollars attorney's fees, stipulated to be paid in said mortgage in case of foreclosure thereof, which sale will be made by the sheriff of Polk county or his deputy, at the front door of the First National bank in the village of Red Lake Falls in said county of Polk, Minnesota, on Saturday, the 14th day of March, 1891, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon of that day.

Cupid's arrows have marked may an captive the past season, and weddings have thus been quite numerous. The season of Lent will for a time lay the urchin up with a severe stomache ache and he will thus be oblidged to take a rest

Yesterday was Ash Wednesday, one of the principal holidays of the year. The season of Lent is now usherd in, and the festivites that have marked the past few weeks are brought to an abrupt close. Al over the Christian world this great season is observed.

Now it's all clear, and the boys are wondering why they didn't catch on before. Congratlations Thomas.

There is every prospect for a lively summer for Red Lake Falls. According to our real estate agents, their trade has not been so lively for a considerable length of time. Two railroads are the least our citizens expect—The Great Northern and the D. R.L. F.&N. Then there will be the starting up of the saw mill and consequent employment of a great many men, the building of the fine new schoolhouse, a brick block with a 75 foot front and 3 stories high by A. Bancharal. Of course the new court house and county buildings won't cut much of a figure.

Buckwheat flour 4 cents a lb. at Langevin's.

The newspaper without any advertisements, which Mrs. Julia Ward Howe wants to see, might suit the tastes of some people, but it would be without a very interesting feature. The idea that the advertisments in a newspaper only please the counting room unfortunately obtains in some quarters, but to the great mass of the people they are not only interesting but useful and instructive reading. They are the shoppers' constant companion, the business man's guide and everbody's instructor. A newspaper without advertising columns would fail to accomplish its mission. Besides, it would be about as poor as Job's turkey.

It is a capital ideas to divide this county as it would save both time and money. If we have to transact business at Crookston on Thursday we have to leave on Tuesday and cannot get back before Saturday, which would be five days; and if on Tuesday we should have to leave on the preceding Saturday and could not get back before the next Thursday, which would make six days. So it makes it an expensive trip. When our county officials are called out here the mileage and the extra days it takes make quite a hole in the treasury. A division must be profitable as well as more convenient for the people at large.—E. G. Forks Fosston Cor.

Village politics begin to liven up. But there is comparatively little interest when we think of the bloody frays of former days. The sword then was never sheathed as it is now between elections. Each move of a council then had a tendency to add zest to the ferocity of the opponents and open new sores. Months were spent planning and plotting, wire pulling and setting up pins till the day arrived. It seemed each faction always felt the breath of victory on their brow, for the defeated faction invariably accepted their fate with very bad grace and annually swore, by the honor of their ancestry and the blood that flowed in their veins to "win or die!" at the next election. The story repeated itself year after year until even the children, who had breathed the air of battle and listened, from earliest infancy, with bated breath, to many a tale of woe, caught it up and were embued with the spirit of rivalry. The ladies—the dear ladies—they were not exempt. It was not an uncommon thing to see, after the polls were closed, and the ballots counted, a group of anxious faced women, evincing more interest in the outcome than even their enthusiastic help-meets. No doubt a presentiment of defeat always warned the vanquished, for when the results were announced they were not present to hear the wild cheers and shouts and waving of handkerchiefs. We remember quite distinctly, noticing the ladies in particular, of seeing the tears (of joy, no doubt) rise and plunge one after another, down a fair dame's cheek. No, election in Red Lake Falls isn't what it used to be, but whether or not to lament this fact is the question.

OFFICE OF BANGS & CO.,
RED LAKE FALLS, MINN.

To Our Patrons,---We take this opportunity of expressing our thanks for past patronage and asking for a continuance of the same during the ensuing year.

We shall strive to anticipate the wants of our customers by keeping a fully assorted stock of staple and fancy groceries, dry goods, clothing, hats and caps, boots and shoes, etc. These we do not claim to sell at, or below cost, but at a very moderate margin of profit, and, as we shall buy and sell for cash (or exchange) only, we feel sure that our prices will average low.

We shall aim at all times to allow the highest market price for wool, hides, fur, butter, eggs and snake root and will exchange our goods therefor at cash prices.

To those who prefer to buy their groceries in large quantities for cash we will make extra close prices. Do not send your money out of the county until you know what your home dealers will do. If they will do as well as strangers why should you, by your trade, build up distant towns at the expense of your own?

We will make large reductions from regular prices on our winter goods, such as overcoats, ladies and childrens' cloaks, blankets, warm footwear, etc. If you are needing any of these goods give our prices before you buy elsewhere.

We would call your attention to our large supply of fish for the Lenten season. As usual we have a full variety and prices are very low.

Wishing you a prosperous year,

We Are Yours Truly,

BANGS & CO.

Is marriage a failure? The answer to this much asked question could surely be got of the young grasswidower this week. He ought to know.

Valentine's day Saturday, the 14th of February. Everybody knows what Valentine's day is. We have interviewed several dealers in that commodity who have evinced the fact that Valentine's day in Red Lake Falls this year will be the most notable one ever witnessed. So you who have not invested better do so at once or you will be left with several hundred, more or less, vicious valentine on your hands and the debt unpayed. Now, when this great day of great days arrives, our memory seems determined to soar back to the day when Artist Helm played that "Bob tail Flirt" joke on the News. Joseph, very kindly, too, never alludes to that victory of his. Doubtless he knows what agonies a bare mention of it might inflict.

THE labor bill now before the German reichstag provides for the rigid enforcement of Sunday rest.

AT Zschoppan, in Saxony, a man was fined $3.50 by the police for inscribing his occupation on the census blank as "a starving weaver." Truth isn't wanted very much there.

THE vast number of people dying now at the age of 100 and upward leads to the reflection that whereas "there were giants in those days" there are herculean liars in these.

AN Indianapolis man challanges another to a contest in getting off trains. With a good many people who indulge in this sort of sport it is a contest to a finish.

ELK'S tongue is said to be one of the choicest delicacies known to epicures. Doubtless there are times when John L. Sullivan feels as if he could crunch the entire animal.

DANIEL WEBSTER is said to have been the first editor of the first college paper published in this country, the initial number appearing at Dartmouth in 1809. These journals now number 190 in the United States.

GUM CHEWING will have to be classed among the manias soon. An Ohio teacher chastised a girl for refusing to give up her wad, whereupon she and her mother attacked him and gouged his eyes out.

THE apprehension that exists concerning the oyster's ultimate fate gives rise to an awful dread that the providers of food may be reduced to the necessity of cutting them in two in order to see that each stew has its representation.

CHARLOTTE SCOTT, the colored woman who contributed the first five dollars paid toward a monument for Abraham Lincoln in Washington, and whose name is on that account inscribed in bronze on the base of it, died recently.

NOW the "boomers" are invading the Cherokee strip. The misguided individuals who "boomed" into Oklahoma last year are now enthusiastically retracing their steps as rapidly as providence and their finances will permit.

THERE are a few demonstrated truths in politics and one of them is that a party gets along most prosperously and comfortably when it puts its best foot foremost. We may add that this truth is of universal application to all parties, at all places, at all times.

KING OSCAR of Sweden is a cruel man. He inflicted a lot of speeches upon the people before he ascended the throne and he is now getting them together for the purpose of publication and yet the world wonders when a nation breaks out in revolt against its rulers.

IN ARKANSAS, and probably the other southern states, the little fish follow the big fish, No less than thirteen county treasurers in Arkansas are short in their accounts by amounts raging from $100 to $1,000. This is natural in a state which has twice been defrauded by its treasurers within a short time.

COUNT VON MOLTKE compels all the members of his family to spend at least one hour each day in the open air, even if the rain be pouring. This is what the ordinary boy would call a "picnic," especially on Sunday, and the announcement is calculated to make the count extremely popular with the rising generation.

PROF. ITALIANUI, the handsome tenor, whose voice was more sweet and pure than his morals, had died. An admiring friend, writing his obituary, had intended to say that "Henceforth he will sing in another world," but the wooden-headed compositor, building better than he knew, translated it to type as follows: "Henceforth he will singe in a nether world."

IT is now being fouud that goat's blood is a cure for consumption. The tests being made show surprising results, it is alleged. The discovery is due to the observation of the doctors that the goat never had consumption. But who ever saw a mule that had an affection of that sort? If the rule is a general one specifics can be had for all diseases. Some animal may be found that never had fits or delirium tremens.

Secretary Blaine said with reference to the dispatch from Ottawa, which gives from a Canadian source what purports to be the manner in which the proposal for reciprocity negotiations came to be made to the United States, that the statements concerning himself and his action in the matter were utterly without foundation.

The report of the army officers detailed by Gen. Miles to investigate the fight between the Indians and the troops at Wounded Knee creek, involving Col. Forsyth, of the Seventh cavalry, has been received at the war department, and is being considered by Secretary Proctor and Gen. Schofield.

The navy department has ordered the Pensacola, which is stationed at Montevidio, to proceed to Chili and the Baltimore, at Toulon, to proceed to the same coast. The orders were issued several days ago, but were not made public. There are no United States men-of-war in Chilian waters and the recent troubles suggested the propriety of having a naval force there for the protection of American citizens in case of an emergency.

A wagon load of nitro-glycerine exploded near St. Mary's Ohio. The driver, horses and wagon were blown to atoms. A big hole in the ground was all that told the story.

The report that hundreds of families were fleeing from the New Castle mountains in Colorado because the mountains were on fire is untrue. The fire is confined to the coal mines and the loss will be small.

At Detroit, Mich., Robert McElroy's retail dry goods store was gutted by fire. Estimated loss and insurance as follows: On stock $100,000, insurance $60,000; on building $75,000, insurance $50,000.

At Cleveland, Ohio, a building known as "Rotten Row," occupied by about 500 Italians, negroes and Turks, was destroyed by fire recently. The inmates, many of them scantily clothed, all escaped, but suffered much from the severe cold weather.

Of a party of forty men engaged in reopening communication with snow-blocked villages between Dimitzana and Tripolitsa, in the Morea, fifteen have been frozen to death and a number of others have been so badly frost-bitten that they are not expected to recover.

BIGAMY IS CHARGED

Peculiar Matrimonial Experience of a Former Wisconsin Couple at Seattle, Wash.

The Husband Marries Another Woman Under the Very Nose of His Former Spouse.

SEATTLE, Wash., Special Telegram, Feb. 9.—Mrs. Minnie L. Beard claims that her husband, Charles B. Beard, is a bigamist, and tells the following story:

She was married to Beard three years ago at Hudson, Wis. He represented to her that he had been married before, but that his wife was dead. About a year previous to that time Mrs. Beard left her home and taught school in Knapp, Wis. At the expiration of the term she lived at Beard's home and kept house for him and his daughter by the first wife. Here the courtship began, which resulted in marriage. They came here about a year ago.

Several months ago Beard deserted her, and, as she has since learned, began paying attentions to Mrs. Lottie Blackman of this city, and last month married her, the wedding being quite a swell affair and made a great deal of in the newspapers. Mrs. Beard No. 2 was in ignorance of all this until a few days ago, when she came across a letter from the relatives of Wife No. 3.

WOULD BURN SIOUX CITY.

Incendiaries Seem to Be Carrying Things With a High Hand.

SIOUX CITY, Feb. 9.—The wholesale grocery store of Tolerton, Stetson & Co. was burned this evening. Loss on stock, $35,000; on building, $50,000.

While this fire was raging Lyon's gun store, less than two blocks away, was discovered to be on fire. The badly crippled department sent one hose team to work on the building, but the building being a two-story wooden structure, was soon burned to the ground, together with its contents. The upper floor was occupied as living rooms by two families, and it was rumored two children were burned to death, but this is not verified. The fires were clearly the work of incendiaries, done, it is supposed, for the purpose of robbery. It is now thought by many that it is the same gang that tried to burn the little town of Covington, just across the river, three weeks ago.

An attempt was made at 11:30 to start another fire in a second-hand store in Pearl street, but the blaze was discovered and checked by firemen.

PROFESSIONAL WITNESSES.

The Difficulty of Convicting Polish Criminals Explained.

SHENANDOAH, Pa., Feb. 9.—William and George Butsairage, Matt Moldazes and John Lalurnikus, four Poles, have been committed to jail in default of $2,500 bail each for murderously clubbing and stabbing five of their fellow countrymen who were instrumental in having a friend of one of the accused sent to jail for assault and highway robbery.

The men named are ringleaders of a society which has for its main object the avenging of wrongs done its members and the payment of all expenses of members who get into trouble before the courts. The discovery of the society's existence is of great importance. Of late it has been almost impossible for the commonwealth to convict Poles of crimes on account of the vast amount of testimony put up in favor of the accused. This kind of testimony is now believed to have been supplied by professional witnesses, members of the society.

RAPID GROWTH.

It Hinders One of the New States in Getting Settled Down.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Feb. 9.—It is learned at the treasury department that a proposition is on foot to entirely reorganize the sub-ports of entry on Puget sound.

Considerable complaint has been made of the location at Bellingham bay and one or two other points, and an effort will be made to have them removed. This can be done by the treasury department without any legislation, as the act organizing the Puget sound collection district allowed the treasury department to fix upon sub-ports of entry. There has been more or less contention about the affairs in this collection district and the unsatisfactory state they appear to be in, and various people are petitioning for changes and removals and reorganization.

Most of these complaints, of course, are referred to the Washington state delegation, as the members have more accurate knowledge of the existing state of affairs than can be obtained by the treasury officials. The new State of Washington seems to have some trouble in getting settled down, and the rapid growth of various sections necessitates changes not foreseen a few months previous.

When he realized that he would live he made an effort to secure the letter, but the authorities had been apprised and secured the confession and took charge of Rogers. The Mercer authorities have been notified by telegraph. Rogers is intelligent and of good address.

DALLAS, Tex., Feb. 9.—A brutal murder was committed in the negro quarter. PEPPERY.

Action of Chicago Workingmen Anent the World's Fair.

CHICAGO, Feb. 9.—The organized labor of Chicago hotly asserted itself to-day regarding the world's fair. It was at a regular meeting of the trades and labor assembly, a body said to represent 47,000 workingmen, and one of whose members was given a seat in the world's fair directory in recognition of the $300,000 subscribed by the workingmen to the guarantee fund of the fair.

Intense interest is manifested in the subject. There had been much discussion beforehand in the meetings of individual unions, and it was generally expected that a climax would be reached to-day.

The excitement began when James O'Connell, president of the assembly, arose and offered the following:

Whereas, when it was first proposed to hold a world's Columbian exhibition in Chicago, organized labor was appealed to by the promoters of that institution to assist them in securing legislation and other influences in favor of Chicago; and, whereas, the members of the various trade unions and labor organizations of Chicago have subscribed liberally to the stock of said exposition; and, whereas, inducements were held out by the promoters of said exposition to the working people of Chicago that in all work done on the buildings of said exposition union labor should be recognized and have a preference over scab labor; and, whereas, the present directors of said exposition indicate an intention of not only refusing to recognize union labor, but threaten to employ indiscriminately non-union labor, thereby flooding the labor market of Chicago with the ultimate design of destroying the trade unions; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, as union men, protest against this treacherous action of the directors of the world's Columbian exposition, and unless immediate action is taken in regard to this union labor, that we shall deem it our duty to oppose in every way any further legislation, either municipal, state or national, in favor of said world's Columbian exposition, and we hereby recommend all working men who have subscribed for said stock to decline to pay any further assessments until proper assurances are given by the directors that said implied plans will be kept;

Resolved, That unless satisfactory assurances are given by the directors that their indicated action will be changed we shall deem it our duty to ask the co-operation of every body of organized labor throughout the country to assist us in making our protest emphatic.

In an instant a dozen men were on the floor, and peppery speeches containing some pointed personalities followed. One speaker concluded with the assertion: "There is no doubt that it is the intention of the directory to kill organized labor." Mr. O'Connell here jumped up and shouted: "We will make the directory put a regiment of soldiers around their grounds i they employ scab labor. The day has passed when organized labor can be ignored in a great public enterprise of this kind." This was received with cheers and loud cries of "that's right."

STILL THE IRISH.

Parnell Condemned and Harrington Criticised by the Prelates.

DUBLIN, Feb. 9.—A pastoral letter from the Catholic primate was read in Catholic churches throughout Ireland to-day condemning Mr. Parnell's conduct and warning those engaged in the Boulogne negotiations to take care that the compromise reached be definite, as the country will have the last word to say on the issue.

Demonstrations by the two rival factions were held in Stradbally to-day. Plenty of policemen were present, and both demonstrations were orderly. Mr. Redmond addressed the Parnellites.

Several Irish bishops, following the example set by Archbishop Walsh, have written letters to the clergy of their dioceses in opposition to Mr. Harrington's appeal to the members of the National League to reorganize in view of the coming general elections. Archbishop Walsh advised clerical members of the league to combat such Parnellite "packing" by refusing to join in the trickery.

In reply to Archbishop Walsh, Mr. Harrington says the archbishop misjudges the object of the league's circular, which is similar to those issued annually by the league. Mr. Harrington says he informed Messrs. Dillon and O'Brien before issuing the circular that in consequence of the collapse of the American tour he had determined to ask the league branches to help evicted tenants. Mr. Harrington advises the archbishop not to commit the priests too hastily to a policy which will lead to two hostile camps in every parish.

The Prrnell leadership committee have agreed to dissolve in view of the accession of Mr. Dillon.

Valuable Stallions Burned.

HURON, S. D., Special Telegram, Feb. 9.—The livery barn of L. C. Treadway was destroyed by fire early this morning. Twenty-four horses, several carriages, buggies, harness, etc., were consumed. Among the horses were two stallions valued at $1,000 and $2,000 each. The loss is about $12,000; only small insurance. The origin of the fire is not known. The warerooms of the Huron Furniture company were also badly damaged and some stock injured. The artesian well and the fire company saved the west portion of the town from destruction.

Badly Bunged Up.

NEW YORK, Feb. 9.—The Hamburg-American Packet company's steamship Polaria, from Copenhagen, regarding whose safety much anxiety has been felt, reached port to-day, five days overdue. The damage was done in a storm on Jan. 27.

CHICAGO, Feb. 9.—Thomas Dudley Easton, aged thirty-eight, said to be the son of millionaire parents living at Mount Sterling, Ky., has been mysteriously missing since last Tuesday. Easton has been connected with an insurance company in Chicago for several years. The last seen of him was at the entrance to the Palmer house, where he stepped out of a cab, leaving a loaded revolver on the seat. Mental aberration and foul play are the suggested solutions of the mystery.

Cockrell and Dawes amused the senators and spectators by engaging in a wordy fight over the introduction of stereotype memorials on the Conger lard bill, etc. The fortification bill was taken up, and several amendments of a minor character agreed to. More important amendments were that two civilians should be on the board of ordnance at salaries of $6,000, and increasing to $4,250,000 the appropriation in the fortification act of last session for the procurement of heavy ordnance. Mr. Dolph offered an amendment appropriating $1,000,000 for a plant for heavy ordnance at some point on the Pacific coast, and for the appointment of a board to select the site. Disagreed to—23 to 27. The bill was then passed. The military academy bill was then taken up, and passed but with one amendment. The pension appropriation bill was then taken up, and went over as the unfinished business.

In the house the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill was agreed to. During the discussion Mr. McAdoo of New Jersey spoke in favor of reciprocity with Canada. The Basso and the King.

It is related of Signor Bagagiolo, whose big bass voice used to sound sonorously at Covent Garden a few years ago, that once when he was supposed to be representing the King in "Hamlet" he was urged by an intelligent stage manager to exhibit some signs of terror. He declined on the ground that it would be undignified in a King to be afraid of anything, and continued to comport himself with a wooden stolidity which, as his explanation tended to show, was intended for a regal bearing. On the operatic stage there are not a few vocalists with no more idea of interpreting character than was possessed by the good-humored bass, and there is reason to believe that for this cause a good many regular visitors to the opera houses have but a very faint idea of the plots of many well-known works.—The Saturday Review.

ONE would think that the luxury of travel on board an ocean steamer in these days would satisfy the most fastidious, but it doesn't. Everything on earth but a balcony for each stateroom is provided, so a big kick is now being organized for "fresh air" in sleeping quarters. The kickers would do well to consider the kind of vessels and accomodations their ancestors enjoyed on their way over. Take the Mayflower, for instance.

MINNESOTA SOLONS.

Condensed Proceedings of Both Branches of the Minnesota Legislature.

What is Being Attempted in the Way of Legislation by Our Lawmakers.

Monday, Feb. 2.

SENATE.

After considerable progress had been made in the routine business of the senate it was decided to take up the governor's appointments that had not already been acted upon, and for the first time in the history of the state the senate went into executive session with open doors.

The first appointments on the list were those far the state prison board. Senator Donnelly said that the committee of the legislature investigating the action of the board in regard to the manufacture of binding twine had not yet made its report, and he moved the name be laid over and the motion was agreed to.

Next came the name of J. P. Williams as member of the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners. After a slight delay a vote was taken, and the appointment was confirmed by a vote of 26 to 11.

A bill was introduced by Senator Sanborn authorizing the purchase for the state historical society of the sword of Col. Josiah Snelling, who figured prominently in the early history of Minnesota. This sword was formerly the property of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, a signer of the Declaration of Independence.

The agricultural committee was authorized to find out what relation the state agricultural college sustained to the state university.

Senator March's bill relating to taxes, provides that they shall be payable one-half on April 1, and one-half on Oct. 1, instead of all on June 1, as at present.

The senate passed Senate Files 39, 43, 50, 57 and 66. The most important of these was No. 43, which allows liquor dealers to take out licenses at any time during the year, and to pay a proportion of the yearly license according to the portion of the year covered by the license.

It was decided to visit the state university in a body at 10 o'clock next Friday morning.

HOUSE.

Mr. Searle of Stearns on behalf of the house members of the joint committee which was appointed to draft resolutions on the death of the late William Windom, reported on the same and presented a copy which the clerk read. The house adopted them by a rising vote, and the resolutions will be forwarded to Washington by the secretary of the senate.

Mr. Wagoner of Kittson drew attention to page 3 of the journal for Jan. 22, whereon appeared a resolution submitted by himself providing for the appointment of a special committee for the purpose of investigating the cost of construction of all railroads in the state, also the amount of watered stock issued and their general financial condition. The resolution also provides for the employment of an expert clerk.

Mr. Ongstad moved that the resolution be adopted and Mr. Bjorge seconded the motion.

The resolution was lost by a vote of 47 in the affirmative and 20 in the negative, it requiring a two-thirds vote to carry.

AGAINST RAILROAD PASSES.

During the introduction of new bills considerable interest and amusement was caused by a bill offered by Mr. Gildea of Pipestone. To appreciate the situation it should be understood that a number of railway companies have supplied members of the legislature with free passes, and also that most of the drastic railroad bills introduced have emanated from Alliance members.

Mr. Bell of Ramsey moved that the rules be suspended and the bill be read a second and third time and passed. Mr. Capser thought it was a local bill and should be referred to the proper committee. Mr. Ringwald suggested that the bill be laid on the table. Mr. Stone thought that there were not enough members present to suspend the rules, and suggested laying it over. Mr. Wacek said he should refuse to vote on the bill. It was too ridiculous. Mr. M. Walsh said he would like to vote aye, but that he did not want to make felons of his brother representatives, most of whom had free passes. Mr. Currier asked if the bill was intended to apply to the present legislature, and was informed that it would do so.

Mr. Reeve thereupon declared that if the members of the house would have to give up all their free passes if the bill became a law he would have to vote against the motion to suspend the rules. Mr. Gildea said his bill was to prevent the using of free passes by members of the legislature after its passage.

The vote on Mr. Bell's motion to suspend the rules was then taken, and the motion was lost by a vote of 32 in the affirmative and 37 in the negative.

The motion being lost the bill was referred to the judiciary committee and the members will have another chance to vote upon it later in the session.

Mr. Turrell introduced a bill to reimburse Redwood county for the cost of prosecuting the two murderers, William Rose and Clifton Holden, who were sentenced to death under the midnight execution law passed last session, the constitutionality of which is in grave doubt and now pending before the United States supreme court.

Mr. Bell introduced a bill which, in view of recent developments in Ramsey county regarding the alleged misappropriation of jurors' fees, will be noted with interest.

Mr. Caswell introduced a bill which is intended to relieve a husband from liability for the separate debts contracted by his wife and vice versa, except debts for the joint maintenance of themselves and their children.

Tuesday Feb. 3.

SENATE.

The senate to-day devoted nearly the whole of two sessions to the consideration of the Mayo resolutions providing for an investigation of the railroads of the state. After being changed from a joint resolution to a simple resolution of the senate, and being otherwise materially amended, it was adopted without a dissenting vote.

When the senate came to order Senator J. D. Smith presented a petition signed by 500 citizens of Minneapolis against the abolishment or extension of the patrol limits in that city. The petition was referred to committee.

Senator John Day Smith's bill making general election day a legal holiday was passed by the senate.

Senators La Due and McHale both came to the rescue of young girls with bills amending the penal code by raising the age of consent. Senator La Due's bill raises the age of consent from ten years to sixteen years. Senator McHale introduced three bills, amending all the sections of the penal code relating to rape and abduction, and fixing a uniform age of consent in all three matters at thirteen years. The bills all went to the judiciary committee.

In committee of the whole, with Senator Davis in the chair, Senate Files Numbers 59 and 68 were recommended to pass.

HOUSE.

Mr. T. Cole of Otter Tail introduced the following resolution:

Whereas, A certain newspaper published in the city of St. Paul, known as the St. Paul Dispatch, has insulted this honorable body by using vile and disrespectful language in commenting upon the action of the house of representatives of the State of Minnesota,

Resolved, That the representative of the newspaper known as the St. Paul Dispatch be excluded from the floor of this house.

Mr. Starks asked for information and requested that the article or articles referred to in the resolution be read by the clerk. The reading clerk then read an editorial from the Dispatch of Jan. 31, in which a bitter attack was made on Representative John A. Keyes of Winona. When about half the article had been read Mr. Bell suggested that the house could spend its time to better advantage than by wasting time listening to such editorials, and he moved to lay the resolution on the table. His motion failed to pass, and the clerk proceeded with his reading. Another motion was then made to lay the resolution on the table and was defeated as before. Mr. Linnemann of Stearns then gave notice of debate and the resolution went over until to-day.

MANY NEW BILLS.

A large number of new bills were introduced, most of which were of a local nature. Mr. Bjorge introduced a bill empowering county officers to employ women as deputies. Mr. Reeve introduced a bill providing that when a militia company is formed in a town, city or village the mayor and common council thereof shall take steps towards building and equipping an armory building. Mr. Bell introduced a bill, which, while it almost escaped the notice of the members, affected their interests considerably. It was a bill to repeal the law relating to the mileage allowance of members of the legislature. Mr. Anderson introduced a bill providing that all retail peddlers and itinerant merchants, must take out a state license.

Wednesday Feb. 4.

SENATE.

Senator March introduced a bill amending the Minneapolis charter, providing that hereafter the park board shall not issue bonds without the consent of the common council. The bill has the unanimous consent of the Hennepin delegation.

Senator Keller presented a bill which provides that corporations for manufacturing purposes shall not be required to pay any fee for filing articles of incorporation.

NO MONEY TO BUY VOTES.

Senator McMillan introduced a bill yesterday which limits the amount of money that any candidate is allowed to spend in his campaign for election. The maximum amount to be expended is $1,000 for candidates for state offices, including United States senators and congressmen. For county offices the limit is $500, and for town, village and city offices it is $250, except that for the office of mayor in cities of more than 15,000 inhabitants the limit is $500. These amounts must include all moneys spent to secure nomination as well as election. Sworn statements of the amount of money so spent must be filed with designated officers before certificates of election are issued.

A large portion of the day was spent by the senate in committee of the whole. The morning session was presided over by Senator Leavitt, while Senator Eaton occupied the chair in the afternoon. The following bills were recommended to pass: S. F. No. 73, allowing non-residents to use public town libraries; No. 80, increasing jurors' fees; No. 84, reducing the number of people necessary to incorporate a village to one hundred; No. 60, providing for a committee to consider the subject of waterways; No. 82, to protect and reimburse any reversioner against the failure of any tenant for life to pay taxes; No. 106, relating to banks and banking; No. 110, relating to the duties of public examiner.

HOUSE.

Do Water Snakes Poison Fish?

Having repeatedly been interested in watching how water snakes feed, I was careful in noting how one peculiar snake maneuvered to get a meal in Crum brook, one of the trout streams preserved by one of the Quaspeake club, of Rockland county, N. Y., of which I am warden.

A snake darted from under the bank and seized a chub about three inches long, half of its body being in the mouth of the snake. I struck the reptile smartly with my cane, when it darted away, and the fish wiggled off slowly for a few feet and then lost all power of motion, although it did not seem to be even slightly bruised. Upon taking it out of the water I observed a thick slime or mucus covering the whole body, which I scraped off, and returned the fish to the water. At first the fish was very active, swimming around lively, but in a few moments seemed once more to lose the power of motion, I again took it out of the water; and found the coating of slime thicker upon its body than before. I scraped it off again, with the same result, and finally the fish turned on its side dead, and in about five minutes spent in perfect quietude on my part, the snake came from under a submerged stump seized the fish and disappeared. This incident led me to believe that the snake poisoned the fish by coating it with the thick secretion I found upon its body. However this may be, I now take great care to kill all the snakes that I find in the club waters. —Henry Brendon, in Nature's Realm.

SINGLE TAX DEPARTMENT.

BOSTON'S MAYOR ON TAXATION.

The mayor of Boston, in his inaugural message, discusses the problems of local government and taxation. He declares that the present condition of affairs is due "not only to defective administrative methods but to the loose, hap-hazard and unsystematic way in which public improvements have been undertaken, to a radically bad system of taxation, and to the dependence of the city government on the State Legislature." He complains that since the common law rights of abuttors in the soil of the highways has been taken away, and vested in the State, that successive legislatures have granted the use of these highways to private corporations without compensation to the abuttors, either as individuals or as members of the municipal corporation. The result is, he says, that the supposed business necessities of one generation have become a burden to another generation, and that a proper regard for public interests demands that the abuse shall cease.

He further says that if the city has the power to raise its taxes in such manner as it sees fit, it would certainly be profitable for Boston to levy its taxes less on credits and other forms of personal property than is done at present. The city might prefer, he thinks, to raise some portion of the $2,000,000 now collected from personal property by a tax on legacies and successions, but it would unquestionably decrease taxation on other forms of personal property. The Mayor further suggests that the city should have the right to undertake for itself all functions of a public character now commonly intrusted to private enterprise. He thinks the city probably would not exercise these powers, but its possession of them would enable it to make better terms with individuals and corporations seeking municipal privileges. Here again, we have the clear discrimination made by Mayor Sargent, of New Haven, between the resumption by government of public functions and duties and the assumption of the management of private enterprises. We have not been in the habit, in the past, of looking to the the Mayor's message for the elucidation of politico-economic problems, but the growing difficulties of municipal management, and the increasing burdens of taxation on urban populations is forcing all intelligent men concerned into a serious consideration of such problems.

There appears to be a note of regret in the allusion in the message to the taking away by the State of the common law rights, once possessed by abuttors, in the soil of the highways of the city. Does the mayor imagine that there are many owners of land lying along the street railways of Boston who have suffered pecuniarily by the construction of such lines? We doubt if many instances of the kind could be found. The real sufferers are the people of Boston, who rightfully own its streets, and whose property has been taken from them by the State and given over to private individuals to be used for their personal profit. The result is that the people thus robbed are now taxed on the products of their labor to meet public expenses that ought to be met out of a public revenue of which the city has been unjustly deprived.

The Single Tax and the Farmer Again!

A Mr. Connolly, United States consul to New Zealand, has been discussing the politico-economic condition of that country in the Brooklyn Eagle. In regard to the single tax agitation now going on in New Zealand he says:

There is considerable agitation in the colony at present as to the merits and demerits of a single land tax. But as the farmer, upon whom the burden must ultimately fall, has to contend with the many trials and vicissitudes which beset the farmers of other lands it is difficult to thoroughly understand how he is to survive and prosper under the additional taxation which must naturally follow the adoption of the single land tax system.

All of which goes to show that Mr. Connolly doesn't know what he is talking about. But Mr. S. D. Guion is determined that the readers of the Eagle shall not be misled by Mr. Connolly's specious reasoning, so he explains to them, and explains at Mr. Connolly, what the single tax theory really is and how it would really operate. It is to be hoped that the Eagle's readers, especially Mr. Connolly, have read and inwardly digested the following, which appeared in that paper lately:

It [the single tax] is not a tax on land but on the value of land, on the value of bare land without improvements, as a vacant lot in a city. It is not a tax on area, but on value. There is but little value on the bare land of a farm of 100 acres that would sell for $5,000. I have in mind one farm of 100 acres that would sell for $6,000, the owner of which computed the value of the improvements, the clearing, so as to fit it to be convenient and easy to cultivate, fencing, ditching, digging well, planting orchards, etc., house, barns and outhouses to be $5,300, leaving the value of the bare land but $700. His State and county tax was $46. Under the single tax it would have been $35. The profit made from using land is what gives it its value; the larger the profit the greater the value. From using some city lots a profit of thousands of dollars can be made. From some farms of a thousand times the area of the city lot, no profit can be made. Some city lots have great value. Some farms have only an improvement, but no land value. The greater the service the owner or user of land receives from the Government, the larger his profit can be. If he receives no such service he can make no profit. The service of government is as to the size and density of the community. The larger and more dense the community the greater the service of government. Each should pay a tax in proportion to the service he receives from government. The owner of a city lot from the use of which he can make a profit of thousands of dollars annually, receives from government all the service possible, while the service that the owner of a farm of 100 acres, the land value of which is but $700, receives is trivial. Therefore a tax on the value of land would be equitable. Each would pay exactly in proportion to the value of the land he was using. The farmer would be relieved of a great burden and not only survive, but would become prosperous under the conditions which would naturally follow the adoption of the single tax on the value of land. It is quite a mystery to me how any one can find it difficult to understand so simple a problem. Mr. Connolly, the United States consul to New Zealand, undoubtedly has given the subject considerable thought. He recognizes results, but ascribes them to causes from which they do not and cannot naturally and logically in the first instance proceed. If Mr. Connolly will study the subject, argue it along the line of logical sequences, he will find that the evils of which he speaks and all the evils that affect the general interest of the people of New Zealand or any other country are caused by inequitable taxation and that the single tax is the remedy, because it is equitable.

Mr. George on Australia.

Henry George has an article on Australia in the Cosmopolitan for January in which he says: "Here is a country with as large an area as our own, and but one-twentieth of our population. They have the Australian ballot; they have responsible government; they have a permanent, non-political civil service; they have a most admirable and simple system of land registration and transfer; they have government ownership and operation of railroads and telegraphs. Trades-unionism has with them reached a more powerful development than anywhere else, and they have come nearer to the adoption of the eight-hour working day. They have State statisticians that shame our National and State bureaus, and they have carried paternalism in some respects to a length unknown in any other English-speaking country. They have, too, the same social and economic problems. They have great public debts. They have land monopoly in gigantic form. They have had land speculations that would equal, if not surpass, those of any 'boom town' of our West. And (for it follows) they have their 'unemployed,' their charity organizations, and strikes, that in relative magnitude and importance, are the greatest that have anywhere yet taken place."

This is a lesson for the Socialist. With far more than we have of what the Socialist cries for, labor troubles are worse than with us, and 58.05 per cent. of the population is in the cities. The reason of the excellence of the Government is perhaps explained in a later remark: "Fortunate above all other countries, Australia has never known war." Wakefield's plan of colonization by selling the land so high that the poor could not buy it and using the proceeds to assist emigration is described.

Mr. George gives a short and entertaining lesson in geography, with a map. To those who are long from school the facts seem fresh. Intelligent appreciation of institutions requires ability and constitutes the main interest of this paper. Mr. George thinks the Australians are much like the Americans.

The "Literary Development of California," also in this number, contains an excellent portrait of Mr. George. It has, besides, some forcible words by Edward E. Hale on "Education of Public Spirit," in which he takes the ground that government should come from the people up, not from the "upper classes" down.

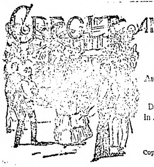
Why are Wages High or Low?

Look over the world to-day. In countries the most widely differing—under conditions the most diverse as to government, as to industries, as to tariffs, as to currency—you will find distress among the working classes; but everywhere that you thus find distress and destitution in the midst of wealth, you will find that the land is monopolized; that instead of being treated as the common property of the whole people, it is treated as the private property of individuals; that, for its use by labor, large revenues are extorted from the earnings of labor. Look over the world to-day, comparing different countries with each other, and you will see that it is not the abundance of capital or the productiveness of labor that makes wages high or low; but the extent to which the monopolizers of land can, in rent, levy tribute upon the earnings of labor. Is it not a notorious fact, known to the most ignorant, that new countries, where the aggregate wealth is small, but where land is cheap, are always better countries for the laboring classes than the rich countries?—Progress and Poverty.

Is Capital a Bad Thing?

The Indiana House of Representatives has passed a resolution proposing that Indiana shall co-operate with Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, Ohio, Kentucky and Pennsylvania in an inquiry as to how much capital is loaned in those States, with a view to taxing such capital. The resolution includes the other States named, because it has dawned on the Indianians that if one State begins taxing such capital, alone, the lending companies will withdraw from that State. It seems to us this ought to recommend the scheme. We take it for granted that the States that are trying to tax capital find they have too much of it and are trying to drive it away. If this be the case action by a single State is sure to be more effective than a joint action by a treaty between several States, which may perhaps be found violative by the Federal Constitution.

THE social pressure which forces on our shores this swelling tide of immigration arises not from the fact that the land of Europe is not all in use, but that it is all appropriated. That will soon be our case as well. Our land will not all be used; but it will all be "fenced in."—Social Problems.



CREOLE AND PURITAN

By T. C. DE LEON.

Author of "Four Years in Rebel Capitals," "Juny," "Cross Purposes."

DEDICATED TO HON. HENRY WATTERSON,
In Memory of Schoolboy Days, Still Unforgotten, as Our Shadows Lengthen
Toward the Sunset.

Copyright, 1890, by J. B. Lippincott Company, and published by arrangement with them.

A little pale, he shakes the rein loose and gives the black the spur. In a rush like the wind the steeds tear on toward the stand, a hundred yards away. Closer forges the black; he reaches the mare's flank, her girth, then laps her, nose and nose, for twenty yards!

The silence of death hangs upon the crowds. With baited breath and straining eyes women and men hang on that gallant trial. Suddenly the silence breaks with a wild yell.

Just as the corner of the long stand is reached the little mare slips inch by inch away from the black, almost showing daylight between!

Thirty yards to hold that lead, and the race is hers! Everett never moves his eyes from the mare's head. Erect, easy and calm, he presses the spur lightly on the noble horse under him. Jonathan is doing his best! So they tear along; half the stand's length is passed, and Jonathan only hugging the white mare's girth.

Again the wild yells rise from stand and stretch. 'Tis plain now that the race is won, and that the Yankee has lost it!

Suddenly a white flash of the whip in Everett's hand rises high in air. Once, twice, it comes down with full force of that limber wrist full on the black's neck. Never before has he felt the lash!

With a quiver of the nostril and a wild, human appeal in the eye, Jonathan gives a fierce rush, laps the mare, passes her with one bound, and rushes under the string with her nose at his steaming flank!

So rapid is the pace, so sudden the change, that the shouting crowd scarce realize it before the flashing steeds are round the curve pulling up, and the English captain races in, a good third.

Then they look up the home and see the roan just graze the distance flag, and, far across the field, men are running to meet the Count de Chavirac, as, streaming with clay and mire, he leads a limping horse toward the back stretch gate.

PART II—CHAPTER V.

THE CREOLE CARNIVAL.

Mardi Gras morning in the Queen City of Carnival!

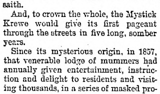
The great day of the ante-Lenten revel never breaks upon a sleeping city, and New Orleans was early astir, with that unique buzz and flurry which so exceed buzz and flurry elsewhere, when once your Creole population does get wide awake. And nothing wakes her so very wide as the carnival festa.

This one, after long abstinence, was peculiarly exciting; and far west into the Americanized city, away east through quaint old Frenchtown, carnival echoes rang and carnival sights greeted the eye on every side.

The entire population, home and transient, seemed to have beaten the sun out of bed, and before he wiped the mists from his forehead maskers thronged the streets in ante-bellum number and variety. For the carnival was on in all its general aspects, if not with all that lavish expenditure of taste and money which makes the displays of the Mystick Krewe of Comus unique in brilliance and in beauty throughout the world. Public masques, singly and in groups, on foot or mounted in saddle or vehicle, would prevail; masquerade balls of every grade, from decorous dance to reckless romp, would be held, and universal levity of public revel, strangely restrained by influence of habit and blithe but rarely vicious temperament, on the hither side of license, would sway the hours from morn till midnight. But the first stroke of 12, in warning of Ash Wednesday, would drop the mask from sinner and saint alike, sending all to their knees for a penitential season of the flood's duration, with Sundays thrown in pour lagniappe, as the Creole saith.

And, to crown the whole, the Mystick Krewe would give its first pageant through the streets in five long, somber years.

Since its mysterious origin, in 1857, that venerable lodge of mummers had annually given entertainment, instruction and delight to residents and visiting thousands, in a series of masked processions, steadily growing in grandeur of conception and richness of display. But when the war cloud settled down upon all that was bright and gay in the southland its murk shadow hid the glories of the carnival as well, and the Krewe was but a brilliant memory to many—an eagerly expected novelty to some.



The Krewe was coming.

That singular society, so secret in its membership and methods, yet so beneficent and gracious in its results, was popularly surmised to embrace the fashion and highest culture of the Crescent City, as it surely did her wealth and her artistic sense. But they who composed it had lost riches, comrades, all save honor, in the stress and struggle of those bitter years; and they had not chosen "to make a Roman holiday" with the grass yet ungrown on graves of kith and kin. Indeed, to the present day those tasteful pictured emblems sent to their elect in many a distant city have borne blank circles with those years, from 1861 to 1866, when the only revel was the red one dedicated to Mars.

But once again the great Krewe was to crown the carnival with one of its glittering pageants; and round that event centered the keenest and most curious anticipation of all the holiday. For, mysterious in all things, these unique mystic societies of the chief cities never advance the slightest hint of what that subject theme may be which they ever illustrate with a tact and taste and brilliance that can be appreciated only by being seen.

But meantime the true carnival spirit ruled the hours. Grotesque costumes of every nationality known, of many designs quite unknown; bizarre monstrosities or cleverly imitated shapes of beasts, birds and even fishes, glittering armors and cheap dominoes were met on every hand. Some went to their frolic singly, some in pairs or in groups of varying size. Most were on foot, but many a gallant cavalier curveted along, while vehicles of every sort, some richly decorated, bore merry maskers, all forgetting the grim past in the absorbing frolic of the present.

Sidewalks everywhere were crowded early in the day, and from many a balcony and window—notably in the less pretentious residences of the American city—peered piquant, pretty faces, intent on the now novel revel and eager to lose no jot of it all the long day. To these occasional cavaliers, more ambitious than their pedestrian co-maskers and habited in best regality of cotton velvet and glittering tinsel, waved gauntleted hands, checking their steeds long enough to toss flowers or confetti at the fair ones. And they would in turn receive perhaps a flower—more probably a tissue paper cartridge loaded with flour or a torpedo to explode before the horse's nose.

Restaurants, cafes and wine shops threw wide their doors, receiving liberal patronage, for, numerous as were the maskers, tenfold greater was their al fresco audience. The entire population seemed turned into the streets, and at any unusual squeak of tin horns, or louder beat of drums, patrons of cafes would rush to the doors, fork in hand and mouths full, to lose no point of passing fun.

But of all lookers on none approached for wide eyed wonder and absorbed curiosity the federal soldiers of the city garrison. Composed of almost every nationality and coming from every city of the Union, save those where mummery was born almost with the century, this public masquerade was to them inexplicable as interesting. And very wistfully they gazed, too; for the spirit of universal mummery has in it strong infection, and they could not yield to it. Strict orders had been issued that no soldier should mask, or disguise his uniform, under any pretext, and only officers off duty were permitted that privilege, after formal report of intention to their commanders.

The general was a true soldier, and he justly realized the serious results possible to chance from a mixture of differing and discordant elements, under the temptations and novel conditions of the incognito.

"By Jove! the general's head is level as possible on all matters of discipline," our irrepressible major of the quartermaster's department enunciated to a group of disguised officers in Gen. Everett's garden about noon. The major had removed his ample mask, but ruefully regarded its flattened nose, as he threw back the hood of a flaring red domino. "Why, Arnold, suppose a lot of ignorant soldiers had been caught, as we were, under that balcony on Rampart street!"

"I don't think the results would have been battle, murder and sudden death," laughed the aid-de-camp, mopping his brow, after removing his mask. "But you should have seen the major bear himself, general. He is as great in piloting green hands through a carnival as he is at ordering a breakfast."

"Oh, I'm an old masker," answered the major, complacently. "When I was a brevet at Fort Pike, in the forties, I used to run down here and attend the masked balls at the old Hotel St. Louis! Ah, my boy, those were days! But that was hot work under the balcony."

"Rather," put in the junior aid. "Why, general, the major led a charge on a bevy of the prettiest girls and bombarded them till our flowers were gone. They returned the fire with flour cartridges and torpedoes, and when we turned to retreat a crowd of a dozen harlequins charged us with bladder clubs and routed us utterly."

"It was hot!" grumbled the major. "Look at the nose of that mask, sir! And I believe those cartridges had pepper in them. One of the cursed things got down my back, and it is tingling now."

"Well, I've had enough of the fun," said Col. Barnes dryly, wriggling out of a long gray domino. "I've read of carnivals for years; but I never expected to fly about in a mask and pelt strange young women with flowers. Hang it! if Mrs. Barnes gets hold of the story!"

"Pshaw, man!" retorted the major. "do not desert us. We've only seen the beginning of the fun yet. And, Dale, are you not going in for a trial?"

"Hardly in that way, major," Everett answered. "It is a trifle infra dig. to ride steeple chases, and I may as well let masking alone. But really I believe I enjoy the day better as a looker on. Like Barnes, I was most eager to see a Creole carnival; but the reality exceeds any fantastic thing I had imagined."

"Just wait till to-night," the major said. "If the day interests you the Mystick Krewe will delight you. And then the balls! They are something only to be dreamed of. But you had better try a domino before night just to see how it feels."

"I may take a turn among the maskers this evening," Dale answered. "Late to-night, after the pageant, I join the general's party and take the ladies to the opera house and to the Krewe ball."

"Toujours perdrix!" laughed the major. "Always the ladies!"

Everett made no answer, and Arnold suggested that time was passing, and asked the major if he was rested.

"Like a giant refreshed," cried the veteran. "Give me another mask! Bind up my nose! Well, this will have to do. We'll meet here at 3, Dale, and tap that Cliquot I lost to Barnes on your confounded water jump. But I tell you, my dear boy, I'd rather pay for wine enough to fill that ditch than have had Johnnie Crapaud beat you!"

"I know it!" Dale answered frankly, grasping the major's not over clean hand. "But the horse won the race—not I. Come, Barnes, we'll follow these revelers at a distance and not lose the sights outside."

"That is a magnificent animal of yours, general," Col. Barnes said, as they followed the maskers to the gate. "Singular name you gave him, though."

"Oh, that was the Point name for my chum," Dale answered. "The class called us David and Jonathan, and the yearling colt was a graduation present from my mother. I named him after Latour, and I have always been glad of it when I mounted him for a fight."

"Was your friend killed?" asked the colonel, who was not sentimental.

"No, thank God!" Dale answered earnestly. "I heard yesterday that he was safe and well, and he outranked me when his side lost."

"He was a rebel?" Barnes queried, in surprise.

"He was a major general in the Confederate army," Everett replied, with emphasis.

Barnes made no answer. He was, as he described himself, "Cape Cod born," and he had his prejudices, underscored by a Minie ball. But he was talking to his ranking officer, and a passing rush of maskers changed the subject apropos.

The carnival was at its acme now. Even greater crowds than before streamed down the cross streets and overflowed into Canal. Costumes of every shape and color mingled with the every day dress, making a shifting kaleidoscope in the bright sunshine, and over the tramp of many feet, and the shrill treble assumed for better disguise of the maskers, floated constant, happy laughter.

Strolling along the two Federal officers came in sight of the Clay statue. Around it a huge throng had collected. Colonels of several regiments had ordered their bands to different points to aid the public holiday; and the magnificent one of the Ninety-sixth infantry was giving a concert here. Every age and color were seen in the unmasked faces—the ebon, shiny skin of the negro, the swart Diego, and the bright lemon skin of the quadroon. Old, crumpled faced French women led chubby children along; the fresh skinned Irish woman dandled her babe in vigorous arms; while pale, fair octoroons, tastefully and quietly dressed, leaned on the arms of dandy young men who might have passed for club men on Broadway, or petits creves on the Champs Elysees. Maskers here, as everywhere, in numbers; and a goodly sprinkling of bluejackets dotted the crowd, the faces of their wearers ever showing amused interest.

The band was playing a popular waltz, the heads and feet of the music loving natives keeping time. And here and there, in the limited space, fantastic dancers whirled in grotesque measure, aided by the Harlequin or Pirerot dresses they wore.

"A wonderful people, these," Everett said, quietly. "Who would think, to walk these streets to-day, that this population was just rising from the set back of a terrible defeat? Who could dream of the material loss it has suffered—of the agony and suspense endured—of the hopes that are ashes and the future that is—what?"

"The mercurial temperament," Barnes answered, again from far Cape Cod. "They are French, and a Frenchman would dance on his grandmother's grave. I see nothing very wonderful, general, in their enjoying the first holiday they have had since the obsequies."

"People that react as I have noticed these southerners do," Dale answered, "have too much elasticity to be conquered. We have beaten them, but they will teach us a great lesson yet in their conduct under defeat. I don't think you appreciate them, Barnes."

"Perhaps I do not," the other answered dryly. "I have no friends in the Confederate army."

Just then the band broke into a medley of national airs. The "Marseillaise" swelled out, blending into "God Save the Queen;" that in turn losing itself in the new "Wacht am Rhein." Suddenly, picked up by the piccolo, "Dixie"—the tune adopted by Abraham Lincoln—shrilled out loud and clear. In a second, even before the crowd caught the infectious thrill, the blue coated boys gave voice, and then came cheers and cries from every throat in the crowd to almost drown the music. Again "Dixie" swelled loud and clear; again the wild applause rang out, dying as the music softened and almost ceased, only to rise loud and defiant as "Yankee Doodle" trotted in upon his unmusical "little pony."

This time the crowd needed no cue, the stilling voices rising into a roar louder if possible than before, and sustained until the brief strain died out. Again the cries swelled out, aided by hands and feet and shout of "Bis!" "Encore!" and the rival battle pieces had to be played again and again.

Everett slipped his arm into the colonel's as they turned away.

"No, you do not understand these people. Neither does our general, I fear. If we will let it be so the war is over!"

As night fell the carnival was in full blast, for all recalled that at the first stroke of midnight masks must be tossed aside and theoretic sackcloth replace the motley.

Through the dusk many hued costumes filled the eye with color; the high, squeaking treble of maskers' disguise piped above music, laughter and the omnipresent tin horn; old time scenes of peace were re-enacted in the very center of warlike occupation, and the evening air was glad with passing maskers' songs.

And still the most interested and most wistful of all observers were the Federals—men and officers off duty. Everywhere they mingled in the throng, giving and taking chaff with high good humor and equal regret that their general's order forbade participation. For in all that revived revel not one untoward incident, not one rude act even, had been reported; and the fears of the timid were wholly set at rest by the inborn courtesy and tact of the creole.

And now the throngs began to form spontaneously in order, lining the sides of Canal street in dense masses, added to each instant from the emptying houses and by fresh crowds pouring down the side streets.

The Krewe was coming!

Ushered in by rosy glow of distant, pulsing light and softened blare of brazen march advanced that strange procession so dear to creole tradition, so little understood beyond its reach.

Deep silence fell upon the massed thousands; every eye strained to catch the first hint of the cunningly hidden theme of the night's display. Then gradually through the rosy cloud were seen the rich and stately forms, in antique guise, marshaling the mystic host, and next transparencies that told its subject theme to be "Past, Present and Future."

Nearer, slow moving, came the brilliant and unique pageant, incarnating thought through deft design of form and color, lit by a thousand bright reflectors, toned to softer glow by colored fires.

The Past was typified by imposing figures of war, destruction, conflagration, want, grief and terror—each a chapter of the moving epic, varying in suggestive shape, and each made clearer by congenial forms attendant. All were in classic pose and richly draped, with strict adherence to best models of antique art. And slow they passed, between the silent masses, all delighted with the glitter and the glory of the show, all stilled by memory of the recent past from which it drew its being.

Then came The Present, more modern in conception, but allegoric still—personified by industry, commerce, agriculture, science, art and history. Plainly recognized, each of these stately shapes passed on, arched by its floating cloud of rosy light, each greeted by appreciative plaudits for its beauty and sympathy for its suggestion.

And last rolled by the last division of the mystic trilogy, The Future. Radiant and fair of promise showed her beautiful figure, the calm face grand and noble. And round The Future grouped peace and hope and love, simple and pure, as emblematic of the new life to follow that active Present born from the hot and evil Past!

And again that sensitive southern populace, ever apt to read the lessons of mystic allegory, clave the night with plaudits, loud, long and heartfelt!

"Singular people, these Creoles!" the general remarked to a brilliant party on his balcony. "A pretty affair; but, poor as they are, I can't see why they throw away thousands on a useless show."

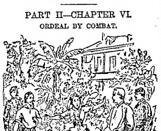
"I hardly think it useless," Dale Everett answered quietly. "It strikes me that this Krewe of Comus teaches deep lessons to its public, and that they not only enjoy but understand them."

"I hope they do," the commander replied bluntly. "But is there another people under the sun who, under such circumstances, would attempt it?"

"Probably not," the Puritan soldier answered. "But is there another that, so attempting, could so succeed?"

PART II—CHAPTER VI.

ORDEAL BY COMBAT.



Just as the terrified woman fell between them in a dead faint.

The crowds of maskers were thinning as a tall figure in gray domino paused at the gate of a brick walled garden. Putting his pass key in the lock he glanced up the street, waiting the approach of a Pierrot. The latter came up, with none of the frolic mien his garb suggested, and waited to be questioned.

"It seems you rather exceed the license of the carnival," the domino said quietly. "This is the third time you have thrown yourself in my way, and now you dog me home. Do you know me?"

"Beyond a doubt," the Pierrot answered, in the squeak of his character. "You are the Federal Gen. Everett."

As to the bill of fare, we realize the painful difficulty under which the housewife labors. Perhaps our assortment of fish may interest her. Prices go lower

Certainly they do. Perhaps you do not believe a dealer when he tells you he gives you more than your money's worth. Men go into business not for the benefit of others, but for themselves, you will say. But there comes a time when it is cheaper to sell goods at cost than to hold them for a future time. Gen. Sibley Dead.

Gen. H. H. Sibley died yesterday afternoon at 4:30 p. m.

Gen. Sibley was born at Detroit, Feb. 20th, 1811, and would therefore have been, to-morrow, 80 years old.

He moved to Minnesota and resided at Mendota from 1834 to 1862, a period of twenty-eight years, and owing to territorial changes was successively a citizen of Michigan, Wisconsin and Iowa Territories, and of the Territory and State of Minnesota, without changing the location of his residence.

For many years his only companions and associates were the military officers at Fort Snelling, with their famlies, the trader and clerks of the fur company and the Indians. With the latter he became intimately acquainted. He frequently exchanged visits with them, learned to speak their language, ate with them at their fires, slept in their lodges and hunted with them for months at a time. He was given a name by them—Wah-ze-o-man-ne (Walker in the pines)—by which many of the older members of the Sioux tribe of the West yet remember him. Only recently, or late in October, 1888, Sitting Bull, John Grass, and other chiefs of the Sioux Nation, stopped in St. Paul, while returning to their tribes from a visit to Washington, and paid their respects to Gen. Sibley. No man had a better knowledge of Indian character, and few men living have had as much acquantance with the savages as he.

The funeral will be public and cinic rather than military, and it will doubtless be the largest and most imposing event of the kind that has ever taken place in St. Paul.

The funeral will take place Friday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock from St. Pauls Episcopal church, of which Gen. Sibley was a devout member. A singular coincidence consist of the fact that his birthday falls on Friday, when he would have been eighty years of age.

Uncle Sam Has No Rights Beyond Those Of Justice.

From St. Paul Globe.

The cases of the United States against Buse & Co., Howes, Rhinehart & Crocker, F. J. Detling & Co., Ames Bros. & Smith and Brown, Mose & Darling, which was called in the United States circuit court Friday and dismissed, have a very curious history. They were brought in June, 1885, to recover large quantities of logs claimed by the government to have been wrongfully taken by the defendants from the Red Lake Indian Reservation.

The defendants claim that they had made contract with the Indians for the timber, that the secetary of the interior department had approved them and that the Indian agent had taken the money in payment. The United States marshal seized the logs under writs of replevin at the time the suits were brought Since that date the defendants have been endeavoring to secure a trial of the cases At every term of court the United States district attorney has asked for a continuance, over defendants' objections, on the ground that the government was not ready for a trial.

On the first day of the present term the district attorney agreed to try the cases on the 10th day of this month, but when they were called on that day he was not ready and asked for a further continuance; this the court refused, giving him, however, until Friday to prepare for trial. On that day he was not ready, and the cases were dismissed

It seems as it our members in congress might spend their time to some advantage by passing a law remedying such gross injustice. A private citizen, had he brought such cases, would not only have been heavily mulcted in costs, but would have rendered himself liable to suits for malicious prosecution. That the dignity of Uncle Sam, however, is so great that he cannot be even compelled to do justice, may have been a good doctrine for our ancestors, we will not deny. People did not recognize his powers 100 years ago as they do now; but justice is justice, and the sovereign power ought not to be permitted to abuse its great functions to the personal and monetary damage of its faithful subjects.

E. PLURIBUS UNUM.

A Cobweb Party.

To present this entertainment successfully requires some little expenditure of time on the part of the hostess. But she may easily find willing aids at this season of leisure. Let her first request a dozen or more of her friends to prepare some simple, inexpensive article of fancy work, or a small gift which may be purchased in any small country store, and let this be wrapped up carefully in a paper parcel or box. The only other requisite of the game is a supply of rather strong cord in long pieces, several balls of cord or twine may doubtless be found at any village store. Tie one of the prize packages firmly to one end of the cord, and, having secured a room which need not be opened until the entertainment begins, conceal the parcel in some easily found nook, perhaps behind a picture or under the table, or underneath the chair seat, taking care to fasten it well in its place of hiding. Now, as your ball of cord slowly unrolls, wind it about chair legs, door knobs, to the chandelier, the tops of picture frames, to curtain cornices and lambrequins, anywhere at all, but let it extend to all parts of the room, and when the line is of good length fasten the end to the door knob, for convenience, until the others are arranged. If you have several colors of cord, so much the better. Treat each package, wheather full or empty, in the same way. A half-dozen ladies will arrange the cords together, and when you have prepared as many cords as you have invited guests, twining and intertwining them in every possible or impossible way, the room will look like a labyrinth of strong cobwebs. Very great care must be taken to secure the cord to the package, and to tie or otherwise safely confine it in its hiding place, othrwise your labor and the pleasure of your guests will be lost.

When a number of cords, twenty-five or thirty, we will say, have been arranged, they may be kept together in a variety of ways until needed. The room may suggest the best arrangement for each hostess. If each is, in turn, would around a reel or large spool, or if all be wound together on one ball they may be easily unrolled. When the door is open for the guests, to each in turn is given the end of a cord, and he is directed to follow the line, winding as he goes, until he reaches the end. When twenty or thirty people are thus engaged in disentangling and uncrossing so many cords the room presents a lively appearance. Each is intent on finding his own prize, and all sorts of amusing mishaps occur. When a package is found, all the seekers are allowed to pause in their task to inspect it and congratulate the finder. A player who has finished his own cobweb is at liberty to pick up any other which may have been dropped inadvertently. Rules are flexible, and may be greatly varied to suit the occasion and the age of the participants. Any one may intimate to the hostess to whom the cord leading to her prize shall be given. When the room has been arranged the disentangling may occupy two or even three hours.

Washington's Birthday.

We take the hatchet for our text, because to-morrow is the anniversary of the birth of George Washington, and the legead of the little hatchet is inseparably connected with the memory of the great man. And yet these matter-of-fact people, who go patiently mousing around among old documents and records, say the pretty story is not true—and so another cherrished belief is shattered. Still the hatched remains an emblem for a truthful man, (when it does not suggest the bad Indian with his tomahawk) though a good many of our fellow citizens have evidently "burried the hatchet," as it does not appear as a sign over their doors. Railroad men are supposed to have no use for the hatchet as a trade-mark—except the agents of "The Burlington," who have no need for any thing but the truth in detailing the advantages and attractions of the 7,000 miles of track of the system, the superb equipment, the fast time, the corteous treatment, the sure connections. Call on any railroad coupon ticket agent in the Northwest for confirmation, or write to W. J. C. Kenyon, Gen. Pass. Agent. C. B. & N. R. R., St. Paul, Minn.

Give Them the Land.

The bill now before the legislature granting swamp land to the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad is a wise measure. No road has ever been built that will open up a better country. It will save the farmer thousands of dollars yearly by reducing the wheat haul. It will give the north an outlet 100 miles shorter than any other line now reaching the head of navigation. If the granting of the land will ensure the building of the road the State can do nothing better than devote some of their swamp lands to the enterprise.

Advertise.

This is an age of stir. Men must move, and they must make their business move. The man who doesn't advertise in the newspaper is a back number. Men regard him as a curiosity—a relic, and the boys ask him where he got his hat. He is behind the time. The race to which he belongs is nearly extinct. The advertiser has most of the business the relic used to have, and will soon have the rest. And where will the relic be then! What can he do but to retire from the unequal struggle, and join his ancestors in that silent city where nobody advertises—that place whose inhabitents are noted for being "unanimous" and for "letting well enough alone?" No trade revolution is more complete—none better established—than the change which has been worked in the matter of newspaper advertising. The merchant who doesn't use the newspaper advertising columns freely is doomed. The merchant who uses them freely and judiciously must reap great rewards.

Clippings.

Thief River Falls Press.

Mr. R. Jacklin of Red Lake Falls, passed through town the first of the week on a trip to Nelson Park, Marshall Co., looking up a site for a grist mill.

Marshall county has the distinction of having born within her borders the seventh son of the seventh son, Mr. and Mrs. Setterholm being the parents. President Harrison was notified and also Gov. Merriam. The former presented a solid silver cup on which was engraved "Benjamin Harrison Setterholm," the latter sent a check for $10. The child is named Benjamin Harrison Merriam Setterholm" and still lives.

From Crookston Times.

On Sunday last Charley Bradley, of Warren, rode from that place to this city on his bicycle The day was warm and the roads very fair. A country where a person can ride 35 miles on a bicycle in the middle of the winter is certainly a good country to live in.

A meeting of the citizens and farmers interested in locating a railroad from this city to Caledonia was held in the City Hall Thursday evening, the meeting was a decided success. Engineer Ralph was instructed to make a preliminary survey at once, aldermen Morrissy, Schmidt and Bjoin with the Mayor offered, on behalf of the city, to furnish one third of the bonus, the total bonus not to exceed $25,000.

The St. Paul papers announced last week that Toby Velarie after an imprisonment of eighteen months, for the part he played in tar and feather outrage on Jack Sinhold had been pardoned by the Governor. Valarie was sentenced to three years imprisonment and his good conduct while in the penitentiary and the fact that he was the only one taking part in the outrage who was convicted and punished was the reason for the executive pardon.

The present proprietors of Champagne & Dow's addition will make an effort next summer to "boom" their property. Elaborate plans for the carrying out their scheme are about perfected. It will result in a large increase of population for Red Lake Falls.

WEARYIN' FOR YOU.

Jest a-wearyin' for you,
All the time a-feelin' blue;
Wishin' for you, wonderin' when
You'll be comin' home agen;
Restless—don't know what to dö.
Jest a-wearyin' for you.

Keep a-mopin' day by day;
Dull—in everybody's way.
Folks they smile an' pass along
Wonderin' what on earth is wrong;
T'wouldn't help 'em if they knew—
Jest a-wearyin' for you.

Room's so lonesome, with your chair
Empty by the fire place there;
Jest can't stand the sight of it;
Go out doors an' roam a bit,
But the woods is lonesome, too,
Jest a wearyin' for you.

Comes the wind with soft caress
Like the rustlin' of your dress;
Blossoms fallin' to the ground
Softly like your footsteps sound;
Violets like your eyes so blue,
Jest a-wearyin' for you.

Mornin' comes. The birds awake
(Use to sing so for your sake)
But there's sadness in the notes
That comes thrillin' from their throats!
Seem to feel your absence, too,
Jest a-wearyin' for you.

Evenin' falls. I miss you more
When the dark gloom's in the door;
Seems jest like yer orter to be
There to open it for me!
Latch goes tinklin'—thrills me through—
Sets me wearyin' for you.

Jest a-wearyin' for you;
All the time a-feelin' blue!
Wishin' for you—wonderin' when—
You'll be comin' home agen.
Restless—don't know what to do—
Jest a wearyin' for you.

HER HUSBAND'S NIECE.

WHEN did you get this letter?" asked Mattie Henderson, as she glanced into her husband's face.

"On Wednesday," he said, with some hesitation.

"And this is Friday," rebukingly replied his wife. "You carried it about in your pocket for at least two days. It is from your niece, Fanny Atwood. She left New York yesterday and will be here on the 8 o'clock train this morning, and it is half-past 7 now. This is a nice state of affairs, isn't it?"

"It was careless in me, Mattie," the young farmer regretfully admitted.

He was a handsome, good natured fellow, sturdy in frame and pleasing in speech. He had a whip in his hand, and his wagon, loaded with milk cans, was standing at thé gate.

"She says she'll get off at Forest station, where you are to meet her," Mrs. Henderson said, her eyes once more on the letter.

"Oh, pshaw," cried the husband with an impatience unusual with him. "I can't. I must have my milk at Beaver station on time. Why didn't she come over the road most convenient to me?"

"I suppose she'll have to walk here," replied the young wife. "And as she says that she intends to stay three weeks, no doubt she has brought her trunk with her—a trunk of no mean dimensions, I'll venture to predict. I am a good deal more put out about it than you are. There's the butter to churn, the clothes to iron, the currant jelly to make, and goodness only knows what else. She'll be too dainty to lay a hand to anything, and will spend her time reading, sleeping and lolling in the hammock. She might have waited to be asked."

"I know it will prove an infliction," the husband consolingly said. "But I guess there's nothing to do but to bear it. Things may not turn out so bad as you fancy they will."

He got into the wagon and drove off. Mrs. Henderson walked into the spring house to churn the butter. She was seldom peevish and rarely complained, but the visit really seemed inopportune. She was not very strong, and as she worked early and late and took no recreation, it was beginning to tell on her nerves.

The farm was not entirely paid for, and they were not able to keep a girl. She was a sensible little woman, and felt that it was her duty to second her thrifty husband's efforts. Leisure, if not competency, would come by and by.

In descending the steps of the spring house she fell and sprained her ankle, the pain was so great that she almost fainted.

"That means a week of enforced idleness," she despairingly thought. "Time so precious, and that fashionably reared niece of George's more of a hindrance than a help. Oh, dear!"

After much painful effort she succeeded in reaching the sitting room and threw herself upon the comfortable lounge. She fell into a doze, and when she opened her eyes there stood Fanny Atwood, looking down into her face.

She had on a plain, sensible looking traveling dress. Her figure was compact, her complexion healthy, her air cheerful, her demeanor self possessed. Her cheeks were dimpled, her mouth indicated resolution, her soft brown eyes offered confidence and invited it. She had walked two miles through the hot sun, over the dusty road, but one would hardly have thought so, she looked so neat, clean, and placid.

"You are my Aunt Mattie, I suppose?" she said, in a low, sweet voice, a smile lurking among her dimples.

"Yes," Mrs. Henderson said with an effort. "Your uncle forgot to give me your letter until this morning. He could not meet you because he had to deliver the milk over at the other railroad at the hour you named. I am sorry you had to walk."

"I wasn't vexed about it," replied the visitor. "Nor am I in a hurry about my trunk."

"I sprained my ankle," Mrs. Henderson said. "I am afraid I will not be about for three or four days."

"That is too bad," commiseratingly rejoined Miss Atwood. "It seems I was just to come. I can do ever so many things for you."

"Yes," grimly assented Mrs. Henderson.

"I'll first look after that ankle," the visitor said briskly, cheerfully.

She removed her dainty looking cuffs, and then took off her aunt's shoe and stocking.

"It is considerably swollen," she said.

"I am not surprised," replied Mrs. Henderson. "You'll find a bottle of liniment in the cupboard yonder."

"I wouldn't put liniment on it just yet," advised Fanny. "Have you any sugar of lead?"

"Very likely. Look in that medicine box in the cupboard. There's a little of everything there, almost."

Fanny found the sugar of lead, and then some linen suitable for a bandage. She put the sugar of lead in a basin, added cold water, soaked the bandage in it and then wrapped it around the swollen ankle. She went about it like a professional nurse.

"That feels very cooling," Mrs. Henderson greatfully said.

"There is nothing reduces a swelling like sugar of lead water," replied Fanny. "Ill wet the bandage every now and then with it. Just you remain quiet, dearie, and don't bother yourself about anything. You have no girl?"

"No, child," Mrs. Henderson said. "We cannot afford to keep one."

"I'll get uncle his dinner," announced Fanny.

"You'll—get—George his dinner!" repeated Mrs. Henderson.

Fanny noticed the incredulity in her tone, laughed prettily and said: "Why shouldn't I? If you will allow me to skirmish around I'll manage to find things. However, it isn't near dinner time yet. When I went to the kitchen for the basin, I saw you had sprinkled the clothes. Shall I iron them?"

She saw the odd smile that came to her tired aunt's lips and correctly interpreted it.

"Maybe you think I can't iron?" she pleasantly said. "Just you wait and see."

"But the dress you have on, Miss Atwood? It"——

"Was selected for service," completed Fanny. "Of course I'll put on one of your aprons."

When George Henderson returned from his errand he heard some one singing cheerily in the kitchen. He stepped in and saw his niece ironing away as deftly as if she had spent the best part of her life at it. She made such a pretty picture that he stood still and looked at her.

"How do you do, uncle?" a twinkle of merriment in her brown eyes; then she went and kissed him, standing on tip-toe to do so.

"I'm glad you've come, Fanny," he said with heartiness. "I suppose Mattie explained why I did not meet you at the station? But why are you ironing? Where is Mattie?"

"She is lying down, uncle. She fell and sprained her ankle."

Mr Henderson stepped into the sitting room, a look of concern on his face.

"Why, dear, how did this happen?"

"Oh, how does anything happen?" she replied a little querulously. "Through my own awkwardness, no doubt. I almost fainted, the pain was so great."

"Does it pain you now, dear?"

"I am glad to say that it doesn't."

"I'll bathe it in sugar of lead water," he said. "There isn't anything better."

"Fanny has already done that," replied the wife. "It was her own suggestion."

"Oh," ejaculated Mr. Henderson, with increasing appreciation of his niece.

"And she insists upon ironing. A pretty mess she'll make of it."

"Well, maybe not," Mr. Henderson said in a quiet tone. "I watched her a little while. Mattie, you are a good ironer, but she is your equal."

"Oh, nonsense George!" exclaimed his wife. "Reared in the city, as she has been"——

"Didn't necessarily make her a lazy, silly, novel reading imbecile," interrupted her husband. "Perhaps we haven't been just to Fanny. I think she is a solid, energetic, capable sort of a girl, and it is lucky that she came."

"Well, I hope it may prove so," doubtingly rejoined the wife. "George, there's the butter!"

"I'll churn that," he said. "We'll get along. Just you keep your mind at ease. You will get about much sooner if you do."

Fanny Atwood prepared dinner, now and then slipping into the sitting room to wet the bandage, and to chat in her cheery way with her patient.

On the third day Mrs. Henderson was able to hobble to the kitchen, where she found everything in excellent order.

"Look at my currant jelly," Fanny proudly said, as she held up one of the glass jars to the light. It was translucent and bright as ruby tinted wine.

"It is very nice," Mrs Henderson said. "How much sugar did you take?"

"Pound for pound," replied Fanny, "I wasn't extravagant, was I?"

"You were wise," her aunt said with a smile.

She opened the door leading into the cellar.

"Fanny, did you whitewash the starway?" she asked in surprise.

"Yes, auntie. It needed it. I knew you meant to do it, for I saw you had slaked the lime. Isn't it nicely done?"

"Very nicely," Mrs. Henderson said. "But is wasn't right for you to do it. Surely your hands"——

"Look at them," Fanny said, laughing. "They are as white and soft as any lady's. I put gloves on, and I have a sort of dainty way of working. I can do it well without pitching into it all over. I have a knack, as mother calls it. If it was right for you to whitewash the cellar way, it was right for me to whitewash it. I came here to help you and to spare you; to ride the horses, to go to the mill with Uncle George, and to make myself useful and—welcome. If you are not going to let me work, or have any fun, why I'll go right back to New York."

She spoke with voluble earnestness, her gestures rapid, her dimples dancing.

Mrs. Hattie Henderson sat down in a chair and cried.

"Why, aunt, what is the matter?" asked Fanny, her brown eyes widening. "I hope I didn't say anything to"——

"No, dear, you didn't," replied Mrs. Henderson in a broken voice. "I am crying because I am ashamed of myself—because I have been so unkind to you in my thoughts. I supposed that you would annoy me, and hinder me; that you would be helpless, selfish, fault finding; that you"—

"But you think more kindly of me now, do you not?" interrupted Fanny, her hands moving caressingly over her aunt's hair

"Most certainly I do," replied Mrs. Henderson, explosively. "That is why I confess my injustice—why I want to make amends—why I"——

"Don't mind it, aunty," said the sweet, forgiving, sympathetic voice. "I don't censure you, and it's all right now. There may be—and, in fact, there are—listless, frivolous, helpless girls in New York city—and in other cities—but I am not one of them. If I was, I am afraid I would despise myself."

"I am glad you have come, Fanny, and I will be sorry when you go," Mrs. Henderson said, and she meant it. "My prejudices misled me, and I have been taught a lesson. Hereafter I'll not be so hasty in estimating people, especially before I have met them."

Not So Smart.

An uptown Scranton man thought a great deal of his old mother cat for a little while after he reached home the other evening. He saw her carry a dead English sparrow from the front yard to the back of the house, and on the back porch he found thirteen more dead sparrows in a heep. The cat dropped the last one on the pile, and the man praised puss for her remarkable work. It tickled him so much that he went right away and told his nearest neighbor all about the cat's feat of catching fourteen sparrows in one afternoon. His bliss was of short duration, for the fact of the matter was that the cat hadn't caught a single one of the birds alive. The neighbor to whom he was bragging about the cat had shot every one of the sparrows from his window with a little rifle, and the birds had dropped into the other man's yard.—Scranton (Pa.) Letter.

Only a Baby.

A pretty story of royal etiquette is told by The Pall Mall Gazette. It seems that all the royal children, whether of Prussia, Austria, or Bavaria, take equal delight in seeing the soldiers present arms to them. When the Princess Gisela, who is aunt to the little Archduchess Elizabeth, was 4 years old she used to make a great fuss every time her gloves were put on. She was told one day that if she went out without her gloves the soldiers would not salute her. All of a sudden the little girl became most eager to wear gloves. Then as soon as she was out of doors she peered about for soldiers. Directly she caught sight of one she held up both her little fat hands and cried, "I got my gloves."

An Automatic Nailmaker.

An automatic machine for making horseshoe nails has recently been brought out. Wire is coiled on a reel on the top of the machine, which cuts off, stamps, points and heads the nails without any hand assistance whatever. The receiving box contains only perfect nails, for if there is any hitch in the working the machine stops itself, and points out by means of index where the fault occurs. A few moments only are required to remove the offending nail, and the machine starts again.

Wanted It Good.

"Are you fond of music?" asked Mrs. Symphony of an elderly relative from the country.

"Well, yes, I am" was the careful reply; "that is, when it's good music, Laury. Now you take a good accordeum an' a fiddle an'a pair o' bones an' a flute an' let 'em all play 'Old Nicodemus' all at the same time, and I tell you it's sweet!"—Harper's Bazar.

EXCITEMENT IN ROCHESTER.

The Commotion Caused by the Statement of a Physician.

An unusual article from the Rochester N. Y., Democrat and Chronicle, was recently republished in this paper and was a subject of much comment. That the article caused even more commotion in Rochester, the following from the same papers shows:

Dr. J. B. Henion, who is well-known not only in Rochester but in nearly every part of America, sent an extended article to this paper, a few days since which was duly published, detailing his remarkable experience and rescue from what seemed to be certain death. It would be impossible to enumerate the personal enquiries which have been made at our office as to the validity of the article, but they have been so numerous that further investigation of the subject was deemed necessary.

With this end in view a representative of this paper called on Dr. Henion, at his residence, when the following interview occurred: "That article of yours, Doctor, has created quite a whirlwind. Are the statements about the terrible condition you were in, and the way you were rescued such as you can sustain?"

"Every one of them and many additional ones. I was brought so low by neglecting the first and most simple symptoms. I did not think I was sick. It is true I had frequent headaches; felt tired most of the time; could eat nothing one day and was ravenous the next; fell dull pains and my stomach was out of order, but I did not think it meant anything serious.

"The medical profession has been treating symptoms instead of diseases for years, and it is high time it ceased. The symptoms I have just mentioned or any unusual action or irritation of the water channels indicate the approach of kidney disease more than a cough announces the coming of consumption. We do not treat the cough, but try to help the lungs. We should not waste our time trying to relieve the headache, pains about the body or other symptoms, but go directly to the kidneys, the source of most of these ailments."

"This, then, is what you meant when you said that more than one-half the deaths which occur arise from Bright's disease, is it Doctor?"

"Precisely. Thousands of diseases are torturing people to-day, which in reality are Bright's disease in some of its many forms. It is a Hydra-headed monster, and the slightest symptoms should strike terror to everyone who has them. I can look back and recall hundreds of deaths which physicians declared at the time were caused by paralysis, apoplexy, heart disease, pneumonia, malarial fever and other common complaints which I see now were caused by Bright's disease."

"And did all these cases have simple symptoms at first?"

"Every one of them, and might have been cured as I was by the timely use of the same remedy. I am getting my eyes thoroughly opened in this matter and think I am helping others to see the facts and their possible danger also."

Mr. Warner, who was visited at his establishment on N. St. Paul street, spoke very earnestly:

"It is true that Bright's disease had increased wonderfully, and we find, by reliable statistics, that from '70 to '80 its growth was over 250 per cent. Look at the prominent men it has carried off, and is taking off every year, for while many are dying apparently of paralysis and apoplexy, they are really victims of kidney disorder, which causes heart disease, paralysis, apoplexy, etc. Nearly every week the papers record the death of some prominent man from this scourge. Recently, however, the increase has been checked and I attribute this to the general use of my remedy."

"Do you think many people are afflicted with it to-day who do not realize it. Mr. Warner?"

"A prominent professor in a New Orleans medical college was lecturing before his class on the subject of Bright's disease. He had various fluids under microscopic analysis and was showing the students what the indications of this terrible malady were. 'And now, gentlemen,' he said, 'as we have seen the unhealthy indications, I will show you how it appears in a state of perfect health,' and he submitted his own fluid to the usual test. As he watched the results his countenance suddenly changed—his color and command both left him and in a trembling voice he said: 'Gentlemen, I have made a painful discovery; I have Bright's disease of the kidneys;' and in less than a year he was dead. The slightest indications of any kidney difficulty should be enough to strike terror to any one."

"You know of Dr. Henion's case?"

"Yes, I have both read and heard of it."

"It is very wonderful is it not?"

"No more so than a great many others that have come to my notice as having been cured by the same means,'.

"You believe then that Bright's disease can be cured.

"I know it can. I know it from my own and the experience of thousands of prominent persons who were given up to die by both their physicians and friends."

"You speak of your own experience, what was it?"

"A fearful one. I had felt languid and unfitted for business for years. But I did not know what ailed me. When, however, I found it was kidney difficulty I thought there was little hope and so did the doctors. I have since learned that one of the physicians of this city pointed me out to a gentleman on the street one day, saying: 'there goes a man who will be dead within a year.' I believe his words would have proved true if I had not fortunately used the remedy now known as Warner's Safe Cure."

"Did you make a chemical analysis of the case of Mr. H. H. Warner some three years ago, Doctor? was asked Dr. S. A. Lattimore, one of the analysis of the State Board of Health."

"Yes, sir."

"What did this analysis show you?"

"A serious disease of the kidneys"

"Did you think Mr. Warner could recover?"

"No, sir, I did not think it possible."

"Do you know anything about the remedy which cured him?"

"I have chemically analyzed it and find it pure and harmless."

The standing of Dr. Henion, Mr. Warner and Dr. Lattimore in the community is beyond question, and the statements they make cannot for a moment be doubted. Dr. Henion's experience shows that Bright's disease of the kidneys is one of the most deceptive and dangerous of all diseases, that it is exceedingly common, but that it can be cured if taken in time.

NOBLE BARON HIRSCH.

Exiled Russian Hebrews are Made Richer by Noble Generosity.

The anticipated gift of Baron Hirsch of 12,000,000 francs for the benefit of the Russian Hebrews who have sought shelter from the cruelties and persecutions in Russia is soon to become a reality. The Baron has been sending for some time sums aggregating $10,000 a month for that purpose; but his intention is to send the full amount of 12,000,000 francs, or $2,500,000, to be placed in the hands of trustees, who will be empowered to dispose of the income for the amelioration of coreligionists.

The income from the fund will be used solely for the benefit of the exiled Russian Hebrews. It will be used to buy and stock farms, build schools, tenements, houses and barns, and generally to better their industrial and educational condition.

Baron Hirsch is reputed to be worth upward of $100,000,000, most of it made in the building of railroads in Russia and Turkey. He is now childless, having lost his three children, and proposes to administer in part at least, upon his vast estate while he is living. He is said to have expended last year no less than $10,000,000 in charity. In 1887 he made a gift of 10,000,000 to found schools for Hebrews in the Russian Empire, and presented the Czar with $20,000, in addition to be used in works of charity. Baron Rothchild and Baron Worms were made the trustees of the fund.

A short time ago the Baron sought admission as a member into the Paris Jockey Club, perhaps the most exclusive international club in the world. He was blackballed, and the matter was one of the sensations of the day. He subsequently bought the magnificent property of the club and quietly served it notice to quit. This brought the club to terms, and through the intervention of Baron Rothschild the notice to leave was withdrawn and Baron Hirsch was promised an early election.—New York World.

"My heart failed me," he said, as he drew a club to fill a bobtail flush of red cards.

THE retirement of Count von Waldersee from the position of Chief of the General staff of the German army indicates that the young Emperor is no less determined this year than he was last year to have his own way in all things.

THE prince of Wales is not fortunate in his choice of boon companions. One of his cronies has turned out to be a blackleg, and it is probable that the prince will have to go into court as a witness in a very ugly case.

Returning the Favor.

A story told of Mr. Whittier by a Boston lady illustrates his gentleness and courtesy:

A few years ago he called upon this lady one evening when the streets were very slippery. When he rose to take his leave, she feared that he might slip and fall upon the steep sidewalk. Accordingly she made a pretence of needing fresh air and of desiring to post a letter, and went with him to Beacon Street, where she slipped her letter into the mail-box, and bade him good-night.

"But as she started toward home, he turned also, saying, "Wait! I will see thee home, Elizabeth."

And he did not leave her until she was at her own door.

If you live within a reasonable distance of a town where barnyard manure may be obtained for the drawing, or a small price per good two horse wagon load, it will pay you to put in some of the winter getting it to your farm.

The Clock's Secret; or Guarded by Ghosts.

It was hard work to build up a doctor's practice in such an out-of-the-way Southern town, but I held on and hoped for the best. Annie taught in the public school there, and said she was content to wait if it for ten years until she should be able to marry.

I was just beginning to despair, when I heard of my uncle's death in the North. He had left me nothing, however, but his old manor near the town where I lived. A mouldy old structure, inhabited by an old darkey care-taker, and for years the upper floors had never been lived in.

I took Annie down on Saturday to look over the place, for after all it was something to own a house and be free from rent when we married.

"Ef I was you," said the old negress when we explained the reason of our visit, "I wouldn't go up them windin' stairs. The upper floors is full o' ghosts and ghostesses. Why, my brudder went up one day, and he was found nigh dead the nex' mawn."

I only laughed at her superstitions, and started up the fatal stairs. When about half way up the most horrible sounds greeted us. It was, as the old woman had said, as though a whole host of demons were groaning and gnashing their teeth, and the sound seemed to envelop us. They were horrible and were enough to make the stoutest heart quail, for they seemed to increase after they had once commenced. I turned to Annie as quickly as I could, and, seeing by her face that she was likely to faint, put my arm about her to support her as I seated her on a lower step, for the sound ceased as we stepped back.

"Do you mind waiting for me downstairs?" I asked, "while I examine into this, or would you prefer to have me wait and come out another time?"

"No, I am going upstairs with you," she said bravely. "I am ashamed of my want of nerve just now."

As she spoke she leaned back and rested one elbow on the step above her. Instantly the horrible sounds were heard again, but as Annie moved forward again they suddenly ceased.

"You had better let me take you down," I said quickly, as I saw her face lose color again.

"No," she said in a half-subdued voice, "I felt something give way just then, Tom. See what it is."

It did not take me many minutes to remove the carpet, but in doing it I found that I could, at will, render the horrible sounds audible or inaudible. Annie became as much interested and excited as I, and when I raised the loose plank that seemed to cause it all she peered, with as much interest as I, into the cavity it revealed.

"I'm not afraid of anything now," she had said when I hesitated to remove it. "I must see what it is, Tom."

"What we did see was a mass of machinery. There were wheels, so put together that they grated frightfully when touched.

"What do you suppose this was for?" asked Annie.

"I do not know, unless my uncle used it as a sort of watch-dog to keep from being molested while upstairs. He surrounded himself with mystery to make himself and everything about him a terror to both black and white during the war."

We examined the machinery and its connection and found that each step above it was connected with some part of it, so that the sounds kept increasing as one proceeded up the stairs, but, just as I was about to restore the plank to its place, she stopped me, and drawing out a slip of yellow paper, read:

"Behind the clock on the stairs."

Above us, stlll and silent, stood the old clock on the landing. Slowly, and with a feeling of awe, we went to it and moved it, wondering what new mystery was about to be explained; but apparently there was nothing unusual, examined the clock itself and then the wall, having some visionary ideas of secret panels, but all of no avail, and we were about to give up the search when the sun came out again, and, shining through a broken shutter, showed a solitary speck in the old-fashioned paper that glittered like a diamond. Eagerly we worked at it until we could understand the workings of it, and then—yes, there was our secret panel and there was my dead and gone uncles' money box. Taking it into an adjoining room and examining it, we found papers and money amounting to $5,000, which had been hidden during the war for safe keeping. As the money was all in gold; it would have been a godsend to some one had not my uncle, by his eccentricities and mysteries kept every one at bay. Unfortunately he did not live to enjoy it himself, and it was left for me to inherit and make the most of.

Annie and I decided immediately to make our home there, and it is a very happy one, for the winding stairs send forth none but happy sounds now.

It Happens That Way.

WHEN THE SONG'S GONE OUT OF YOUR LIFE.

When the song's gone out of your life,
  That you thought would last to the end,—
That first sweet song of the heart,
  That no after days can lend,—
The song of the birds to the trees,
  The song of the wind to the flowers,
The song that the heart sings low to itself?
  When it wakes in life's morning hours—

You can start no other song;
  Not even a tremulous note
Will falter forth on the empty air,
  It dies in your aching throat.
It is all in vain that you try,
  For the spirit of song is fled—
The nightingale sings no more to the rose
  When the beautiful flower is dead.

So let silence softly fall
  On the bruised heart's quivering strings;
Perhaps from the loss of all you may learn
  The song that the seraph sings,—
A grand and glorious psalm
  That will tremble and rise and thrill,
And fill your breast with its grateful rest,
  And its lonely yearnings still.

FOR LOVE'S SAKE.

The library of Friedholf Castle was one morning the stage of a dramatic tableau. The count's heir and son Norden had a few hours before married the little peasant girl Bromhilda Laurenz, and had now come to ask his father's forgiveness. The count had long cherished more ambitious schemes for his son in marriage, and his rage was furious when his daughter Irmengarde led her brother and his young wife into the library.

Norden's eyes quailed before the stern look in his father's eyes. For once his gay self-confidence deserted him as he sank on his knees at his father's feet and craved forgiveness.

The sight of this gentle young couple only added to the count's anger, as he cried:

"Forgive you! Never! You can go and take your—your wife with you. Go! Do you hear?"

"Oh, father," said Irmengarde, pleadingly, "look at her. She has the face of an angel. No wonder Norden loves her."

"No, I will not look at her—the lowborn, the presuming.

But Irmengarde desisted not in her endeavor to make peace.

"Think of our mother," still continued the soft voice. "Even as you loved her, my brother"——

"Mention not your sainted mother in such a connection."

And, as he spoke, the count pointed to the door, and, turning to Norden, said slowly and sternly:

"Go. Do not let me see your face again."

Norden grew pale to the lips. He had, indeed, offended beyond forgiveness. He had his arm about Hilda.

"Come," he said; "we are not the first who have perilled all for love and have lost. Remember though, turning again to his father, "the fault is wholly mine, not hers, I was deceived myself, and so have misled her. I felt so sure of your love and forgiveness for any act short of a dishonorable one."

"If your idea of honor is to mingle base blood in a pure, unsullied stream it does not accord with mine sir." And the count's lip curled in unmitigated scorn. "I advise you to make new acquaintance with the code."

"I will, sir," answered Norden, proudly, stung by his father's contempt, "and you shall not be troubled with a sight of my face again until I have proved my right to claim the knowledge."

He kept his word. Before another month he had taken passage for himself and Hilda in a sailing vessel—the Odin—bound for America.

Then news came that she had gone down with all on board. Alas for pride and anger! when the Death angel lays his cold hand upon the heart of one we have loved, even though estranged, to all appearances, forever. When the count heard of his son's death, it seemed to smite a blow at the springs of his own life. He fell as though stricken by a heavy hand, moaning:

"My son! My son! Oh, cruel father, to slay his own flesh and blood!"

Irmengarde ministered to him tenderly in this hour of anguish, and when, after a weary, lingering illness he once more arose from his bed, he was a changed man. Months dragged on, sad and interminable, all seasons seeming alike to the mourning father and sister. Then came a morning when the cloud was lifted in a burst of gladness. A cable telegram in the morning papers announced that a few survivors of the Odin had reached America—picked up by a passing vessel—and that Norden and Bromhilda Friedholf were among the names of the saved.

The next mail carried letters to the young emigrants asking them to return, and conveying messages of love and forgiveness; but in the near presence of death Norden's boyish impulsive nature had undergone a change, and he realized that he had failed in duty to his father, and that he must make reparation by doing something to atone to him for the sorrow and anxiety he, in his thoughtless willfulness, had caused him to suffer. So he wrote home an earnest, manly letter, expressing his deep happiness, and gratitude to his father for the loving recall, but saying that he must fulfil his resolve to win a reputation which should add new lustre to his time-honored name; then he would return and lay his laurels at his feet, thus earning his forgiveness.

Ten years later.

At the exhibition of machinery in the Centennial Exposition one remarkable invention challenged a continual interest and admiration. It combined the application of a principle which, though often tried, had never before succeeded. One morning a distinguished-looking foreigner paused among the crowd of spectators before it. On his arm leaned a beautiful girl, evidently his daughter. As it happened, a group of gentlemen were discussing its peculiar excellencies, and their remarks being on their own native tongue, attracted their attention.

"These Americans," said one, "carry off the palm everywhere for mechanical ingenuity."

"But," said one, "this name is not an American one. I see not why it should be in this particular department."

"It has a right here," was the answer, "for Mr. Friedholf's talent received its first impetus in this adopted country, of which he has become a naturalized citizen."

Irmengarde—for it was indeed Norden's sister—gave a sudden start.

"Father," she whispered," did you hear? Can it be Norden?"

Just then the crowd parted and a splendid looking man, in the prime of life, came toward them. One look was enough.

"Father!" "My son!" burst simultaneously from their lips. It was indeed Norden Friedholf who had won this proud triumph, who had distanced all competitors.

"I was waiting," he said after the first greetings were over, "to see what treatment should be meted out to this child of my brain. Then, if successful, I was coming home to you and Irmengarde, and to the dear old place."

Another hour found them at Norden's home.

In the beautiful, dignified woman who came forward to recieve them, it would have been hard to recognize the startled girl in her peasant dress, whom Norden had introduced to them so suddenly as his wife on that never-to-be-forgotten morning, long ago.

Hilda had come to the New World with an ideal to attain to, as well as Norden. It was to render herself worthy of him, and of the proud old name he had bestowed upon her, and she had spared no pains to accomplished herself.

Now she was richly rewarded; for in parting the nobleman kissed her first upon one cheek, then upon the other, saying in his courtly way:

"Good-night, my daughter. I hope it will not be long before Norden brings you to your rightful place as mistress of Dora Castle. My Irmengarde here only waits for you to take the keys as lady chatelaine, to leave her old father. She is betrothed, and will soon be married."

Bacilli on a Bald Head.

Dr. Saymonne claims to have isolated a bacillus, called by him "bacillus crinivorax" which is the cause of alopecia. It is, he says, found only on the scalp of man, other hirsute parts of the body, and also the fur of animals being free from it. The bacilli invade the hair follicles and make the hair very brittle, so that they break off to the skin. Then the roots themselves are attacked. If the microbes can be destroyed early in the disease the vitality of the hairs may be preserved, but after the follicles are invaded and all their stuctures injured the baldness is incurable. The following is Dr. Saymonne's remedy to prevent baldness: Ten parts crude cod liver oil, ten parts of the expressed juice of onions and five parts of mucilage or the yolk of an egg are thoroughly shaken together and the mixture applied to the scalp and well rubbed in once a week. This, he asserts, will certainly bring back the hair if the roots are not already destroyed, but the applicant of the remedy must be very distressing to the patient's friends and neighbors.—Medical Record.

Jean Ingelow at 60.

Jean Ingelow lives in an old fashioned, cream-colored stone home in Kensington, set in the midst of extensive grounds, with handsome trees and many beautiful flowers and shrubs. At least, this is her house in summer time; her lungs are not very strong, and in winter she occupies a little cottage in the south of France, on the shores of the Mediterranean, covered with vines and smothered with flowers. She is nearly 60 now but does not look half her age; her eyes are so bright and her cheeks are as rosy and rounded as a girl's. Of late years she has written very little, and even what she does she rarely publishes, for her theory is that a poet never writes any immortal verse after he or she passes 50, and she may very justly rest on the laurels she has won for herself before she reaches that age.

Wild Men.

With the progress of science a whole race of men has disappeared, the so-called "wild men," in whose existence the most learned firmly believed a few decades ago, and who still live in the imagination of many who are unacquainted with recent investigations. The wild man was supposed to be a peculiar creature, half man and half beast, forming the connecting link between the human species and the apes. The belief in his existence is to be ascribed, without doubt, to erroneous observations and reports of travelers.

Electric Light for Mines.

While it is not impossible that explosions might occur in mines lighted solely by electricity from imperfect insulation or the breaking of incandescent lamps, yet the fact that no accidents of this kind have occurred in the mines in which the experiment has been tried is strongly in its favor. Apart from the fact that insulated wires and incandescent lamps afford no point of contact between the explosive gases and the fatal spark that renders them destructive to human life, the placing of the entire business of lighting the mines in charge of a single agency independent of and apart from the miners themselves would be a great advantage. Those who are interesting themselves in legislation for the protection of miners will do well to give the subject of doing away with all lights in the hands of miners themselves serious consideration.—Philadelphia Times.

THE NEWS.

Official Paper of the City.

JAS. MEEHAN, JR. Editor and Prop.

If Senator Lommen isn't too much of a free trader he will have the laws amended so as to prevent the county commissioners from going outside the state to get a little printing done.

No doubt a large number of the legislators, especially those whose minds are susceptible to fantastical theories have read Cæsar's Column. Many of them see their opportunity, and puffed up by a false sense of the importance of their position they are endeavoring by legislation to enact such laws as will make the cum mune of the twentieth century point backward, with pride, to the senator from Red Eye or some other locality and see how this great man endeavored in the year 1891 to prevent the coming of this period of distinction. Ah! that man had hay seed in his hair.

The farmers of our legislature must remember that they alone do not constitute the whole of the people. When this legislation becomes so unreasonable as to impede the success of every enterprise except that of husbandry, they are producing a cause the effect of which will in time add ruin to their already miserable condition. Instead of awaiting national legislation to remedy their evils they are adopting the theories of fanatics and legislating in accordance to the end that an immense amount of local injury will be felt throughout the length and breadth of the state of Minnesota.

Our love for North Dakota and its inhabitants was never so thoroughly exhibited as when three of our county commissioners voted to accept the bid of a Grand Fords man to do one third of the county printing. This is jug handle reciprocity. This is like sending to a foreign town when you are desirous of purchasing an article rather than patroniz ing your own home merchant. Our commissioners must have concluded there is too much money in Polk county. Two years hence the grim visage of popular condemnation will, by its very look, drive three of Polk county's commissioners further into the infernal regions of desuetude than a pigeon would fly in a week.

The legislature of Illinois has been in session something like five weeks, held in a dead-lock by three farmer members. There are 204 members, who are each receiving a salary of $5 per day—aggregating $1,070 per day. The additional expenses incident to the session will make the total cost at least $2,000 per day. The farmer member usually go to such sessions on a platform of economy. Yet these three farmer members, by refusing to affiliate with either of the other parties, have cost the state of Illinois over $60.000. Are not the farmers of Illinois outside of the legislature paying a little too much for the fun these three members are having?—E. G. F. Courier.

No content with anti railroad legislation our law makers are attacking the manufacturers of the state. Senate file 132 and 201, House file No. 256 and 214 are infamous acts which if passed will be as effective in keeping capitol out of the state as a law prohibiting its investment within our border. These acts are intended to protect the laborer in case he is injured while employed. It matters not whether he is injured through his own negligence or by fault of some other person the employer is equally liable. Should these acts become laws the courts would be full of personal damage suits brought by unscrupulous attorneys who would reap more benefits than the party injured. It is hoped a majority of the representatives will have sufficient sense enough to kill any such legislation.

A constituent of an alliance senator sat down by the side of his idol in an hotel lobby in St. Paul not long since, and told the lawmaker that he the constituent had that day visited the supreme court room and to his utter astonishment the number of judges had increased from three, the number occupying the bench ten years ago, to the enormous number of twenty six! "This," said he, "is robbing the people." "Yes," remarked the senator, and their salaries are so high as to make them extravagant. These many judgships have been created to pay political debts. I can make a good point on this subject when I go home to my people." The senator suggested (there being no prohibitionists around,) they take a drink; and away they went to discuss the propriety of lopping off the heads of some of those twenty six judges.

The editor of the Polk County Journal feels agrieved at the language we used in an article in answer to certain charges made by the Journal. He says all he knows about us is what he read about us in that celebrated slander case "wherein 12 good men and true" found us guilty of slandering a "good and upright citizen." Hear! Hear! His protege "a good and upright citizen." How does that sound to readers of the NEWS? This same man whose character was impeached by six of the prominent men of Red Lake Falls, is taken up and cherished and loved by the editor of the Polk County Journal. We would serve notice on the editor of the Journal, the refined and highly intelligent political corruptionist, that this noted slander case has not yet come to a focus. The verdict of these "12 good men and true," has been reduced by Judge Mills but not reduced sufficiently to satisfy justice—from the Judge's decision we have appealed to the supreme court, where the case will be argued, and we have no doubt the verdict of the 12 good men and true which the editor of the Journal and his protege rejoice in will be reversed. As to our capability of editing a paper, we will leave others to judge. We may not be endowed with the intelligence of the Journal editor but when he attacks us and perverts the intention of any article which appears in the columns of the NEWS he may expect us to defend ourselves. We never met Cook but once and then he was pointed out to us as Polk County's political prostitute. From any further acquaintance we pray providence to deliver us.

The Boston Herald has stirred up some of its negrophile contemporaries in New England by asserting that the Chinese are superior to the negroes in capacity for self-government, intellectual achievements and in most of the qualities required for the higher types of civilization. Consequently, if the negroes are to be excluded and those now here are to be kept in subjection as a menace to American institutions, how can Southerners be blamed for refusing to submit to the negro supremacy which the Hoars and the Chandlers of the North wish to force upon them? So far no satisfactory answer has been made to the Herald's query, but it has, nevertheless, been scolded for its abandonment of the pet New England theory.—Minneapolis Times.

The bill providing for submission to the people of an amendment to the State constitution in favor of a tax on incom, passed the Senate yesterday by a majority of 17. There will be ample time and opportunity for a thorough discussion of the question, so that the people will be able when the time comes to vote upon it intelligently. There is much that can be said upon both sides, but at present there is unquestionably a strong public sentiment in favor of such an amendment under reasonable restrictions. Any measure that promises to compel the wealthy class to bear its fair share of the burden of taxation is certain to find favor with a large majority of the people. At present it is largely borne by the class least able to bear it. The Times is not yet sufficiently acquainted with the details of the bill to discuss it intelligently.—Minneapolis Times.

The Value of Money.

"Few men realize the value of a dollar," said a broker who had in recent years made money. "I worked for a long time as chief clerk on an ordinary salary, and it was a hard task to save $1,000. The people today who speak of $10,000 in a sneering manner as a small sum are the men that don't have it. Every good business man, though, knows just what that amount of money means.

"I will wager that in this city of rich men there are few who can produce $50,000 in cash if suddenly called on. The man who allows money to lie idle will come to grief. Better to close up the ledger every day with you owing the bank, but don't get too far behind. This rule will apply to men who have something to go on, but it would prove disastrous to a poor man. I have made my money on tips, and I have worked them as a reporter would a good item."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Building Materials in Vogue.

The investigations of fire ruins show that porous terra cotta bricks best resist fire as well as water and frost. After these in fire resisting qualities come the various concretes and burned clay work. In the most approved building work now in vogue the iron part is incased in terra cotta, tile or brick work in roof, floor and tile construction, and the hollow tiles are faced with vitreous tile, slate or any good weather proof coating or with a single thickness of brick. Iron and steel work incased in fire proof materials is just now very much in favor.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Colorado's Coal Mines.

Trinidad, Colo., is looming up as one of the future great coal centers in the United States, and there are well informed coal men who predict that the output will soon equal that of the most famous Pennsylvania districts. The output three years ago was, in its infancy, 1,000 tons per day. It has already reached 6,000 tons per day, and is expanding as rapidly as the railroad can make arrangements to haul away the coal to the markets of Texas, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Arizona and even New Orleans.—New York Telegram
